It has survived long enough for the copyright to expire and the book to enter the public domain. A public domain book is one that was never subject to copyright or whose legal copyright term has expired. Whether a book is in the public domain may vary country to country. Public domain books are our gateways to the past, representing a wealth of history, culture and knowledge that's often difficult to discover.

Marks, notations and other marginalia present in the original volume will appear in this file - a reminder of this book's long journey from the publisher to a library and finally to you.

TO THE

FIFTH EDITION.

IN the present Edition considerable improvements and additions have been made. The text has been carefully gone over, and the results of additional evidence, from new MSS., and the more exact collation of others previously known, have been embodied in it.

The digest of various readings has been nearly re-written since the publication of the Fourth Edition. I regret that the printed edition of the Codex Sinaiticus did not reach me till the Three first Gospels were printed. In the Digest to the Gospel of St. John, the whole of its readings are incorporated.

The marginal references have undergone careful and thorough revision, and will be found more practically useful, and more exhaustive of the occurrence of words and constructions, than in the former editions.

The notes have, for the first time since the publication of the First Edition in 1849, been subjected to entire revision. I could have wished to have taken account in them of every recent contribution to the exegesis of the sacred text: but this has been found impossible. Bleek's valuable posthumous "Introduction to the New Testament" has been consulted throughout: and many additional notices have been inserted from other modern works.

I would request the reader, before entering on the work itself, to consult the following portions of the PROLEGOMENA :

- Chap. VI. § 1. Of the Arrangement of the Text in this Edition.
— 2. Of the Various Readings.
— 3. Of the Marginal References.

- Chap. VII. § 1. Manuscripts referred to.
— 2. Versions referred to.
— 3. Fathers and other Ancient Writers referred to.

I would also take this occasion of stating, that the matter of the prolegomena, digest of various readings, and notes, throughout my work, must be understood to be gathered from all sources to which time and opportunity have afforded me access.

PROLEGOMENA.

CHAPTER I.

ON THE THREE FIRST GOSPELS GENERALLY.

SECTION I.

GENERAL CHARACTERISTICS OF THE THREE FIRST GOSPELS.

1. ON examining the four records of our Lord's life on earth, the first thing which demands our notice is the distinctness, in contents and character, of the three first Gospels from the fourth. This difference may be thus shortly described.

2. Matthew, Mark, and Luke, in relating His ministry, discourses, and miracles, confine themselves exclusively to the events which took place in Galilee, until the last journey to Jerusalem. No incident whatever of His ministry in Judæa is related by any of them. Had we only their accounts, we could never with any certainty have asserted that He went to Jerusalem during his public life, until His time was come to be delivered up. They do not, it is true, exclude such a supposition, but rather perhaps imply it (see Matt. xxiii. 37; xxvii. 57, and parallels; also Matt. iv. 12 as compared with iv. 25,—Matt. viii. 10, xvi. 1); it could not however have been gathered from their narrative with any historical precision.

3. If we now turn to the fourth Gospel, we find this deficiency remarkably supplied. The various occasions on which our Lord went up to Jerusalem are specified; not indeed with any precision of date or sequence. It is mainly for the purpose of relating the discourses and events which they were signalized.

4. The difference in character between the three first Evangelists is more striking. While their employment (with that almost exclusively in Matthew, of the series to events in the life of our Lord) is narration without comment, the fourth Evangelist speaks with dogmatic authority, and delivers his historical testimony as from the chair of an Apostle. In no place do they claim the high authority of eye-witnesses; nay, in the preface to Luke's Gospel, while he vindicates his diligent care in tracing down the course of events from the first, he implicitly disclaims such authority. This claim is, however, advanced in direct terms by John (see below, ch. v. § ii. 1). Again, in the character of our Lord's discourses, reported by the three, we have the same distinctness. While His sayings and parables in their Gospels almost exclusively have reference to His dealings with us, and the nature of His kingdom among men, those related by John regard, as well, the deeper subjects of His own essential attributes and covenant purposes; referring indeed often and directly to His relations with His people and the unbelieving world, but usually as illustrating those attributes, and the unfolding of those purposes. That there are exceptions to this (see e. g. Matt. xi. 27: Luke x. 22) is only to be expected from that merciful condescension by which God, in giving us the Gospel records through the different media of individual minds and apprehensions, has yet furnished us with enough common features in them all, to satisfy us of the unity and truthfulness of their testimony to His blessed Son.

5. Reserving further remarks on the character of John's Gospel for their proper place (see ch. v. of these Prolegomena), I further notice that the three, in their narration of our Lord's ministry, proceed in the main upon a common outline. This outline is variously filled up, and variously interrupted; but is still easily to be traced, as running through the middle and largest section of each of their Gospels. From this circumstance, they are frequently called the synoptic Gospels: and the term will occasionally be found in this work.

6. Besides this large portion, each Gospel contains some prefatory matter regarding the time before the commencement of the Ministry,—a detailed history of the Passion,—fragmentary notices of the Resurrection, and a conclusion. These will be separately treated of and compared in the following sections, and more at large in the Commentary.

SECTION II.

THEIR INDEPENDENCE OF ONE ANOTHER

1. Having these three accounts of one Ministry of our Lord, it is an important enquiry may be considered as distinct narratives,—how another. It is obvious that this enquiry c direct historical testimony, be conducted by careful examination of their contents. Such examination however has conducted enquirers to the most various and inconsistent results. Different hypotheses of the mutual interdependence of the three have been made, embracing every possible permutation of their order¹. To support these hypotheses, the same phenomena have been curiously and variously interpreted. What, in one writer's view, has been a deficiency in one Evangelist which another has supplied,—has been, in that of a second writer, a condensation on the part of the one Evangelist of the full account of the other;—while a third writer again has seen in the fuller account the more minute depicting of later tradition.

2. Let us, however, observe the evidence furnished by the Gospels themselves. Each of the sacred Historians is, we may presume, anxious to give his readers an accurate and consistent account of the great events of Redemption. On either of the above hypotheses, two of them respectively sit down to their work with one, or two, of our present narratives before them. We are reduced then to adopt one or other of the following suppositions: Either, (α) they found those other Gospels insufficient, and were anxious to supply what was wanting; or, (β) they believed them to be erroneous, and purposed to correct what was inaccurate; or, (γ) they wished to adapt their contents to a different class of readers, incorporating at the same time whatever additional matter they possessed; or, (δ) receiving them as authentic, they borrowed from them such parts as they purposed to relate in common with them.

3. There is but one other supposition, which is plainly out of the range of probability, and which I should not have stated, were it not the only one, on the hypothesis of mutual dependency, which will give any account of, or be consistent with, the various minute discrepancies of arrangement and narration which we find in the Gospels. It is (ε) that (see last paragraph) they fraudulently plagiarized from them, slightly disguising the common matter so as to make it appear their own. One man wishing to publish the matter of another's work as his own, may be conceived as altering its arrangement and minutiae, to destroy its distinctive character. But how utterly inapplicable is any such view

¹ 1. That Matt. wrote first—that Mark used his Gospel—and then Luke both these. This is held by Grotius, Mill, Wetstein, Townson, Hug, &c., and Greswell, who advances, and sometimes maintains with considerable ingenuity, the hypothesis of a supplemental relation of the three taken in order.

2. Matt., Luke, Mark.—So Griesbach, Fritzsche, Meyer, De Wette, and others.

3. Mark, Matt., Luke.—So Storr and others, and recently, Mr. Smith of Jordanhill.

4. Mark, Luke, Matt.—So Weisse, Wilke, Hitzig, &c.

5. Luke, Matt., Mark.—So Büsching and Evanson.

6. Luke, Mark, Matt.—So Vögel. See ref. to the above in Meyer's Commentary, vol. i. Einleitung, pp. 30, 31.

to either of our three Evangelists! And even supposing it for a moment entertained,—how imperfectly and anomalously are the changes made,—and how little would they be likely to answer their purpose!

4. Let us consider the others in order. If (α) was the case, I maintain that no possible arrangement of our Gospels will suit its requirements. Let the reader refer to the last note, and follow me through its divisions. (1), (2), (5), (6) are clearly out of the question, because the shorter Gospel of Mark follows upon the fuller one of Matthew, or Luke, or both. We have then only to examine those in which Mark stands first. Either then Luke supplemented Matthew,—or Matthew, Luke. But first, both of these are inconceivable as being expansions of Mark; for his Gospel, although shorter, and narrating fewer events and discourses, is, in those which he does narrate, the fullest and most particular of the three. And again, Luke could not have supplemented Matthew; for there are most important portions of Matthew which he has altogether omitted (e. g. ch. xxv. much of ch. xiii. ch. xv.);—nor could Matthew have supplemented Luke, for the same reason, having omitted almost all of the important section Luke ix. 51—xviii. 15, besides very much matter in other parts. I may also mention that this supposition leaves all the difficulties of different arrangement and minute discrepancy unaccounted for.

5. We pass to (β), on which much need not be said. If it were so, nothing could have been done less calculated to answer the end, than that which our Evangelists have done. For in no material point do their accounts differ, but only in arrangement and completeness;—and this latter difference is such, that no one of them can be cited as taking any pains to make it appear that his own arrangement is chronologically accurate. No fixed dates are found in those parts where the differences exist; no word to indicate that any other arrangement had ever been published. Does this look like the work of a corrector? Even supposing him to have suppressed the charge of inaccuracy on others,—would he not have been precise and definite in the parts where his own corrections appeared, if it were merely to justify them to his readers?

6. Neither does the supposition represented by (γ) in any way account for the phenomena of our present Gospels. For,—even taking for granted the usual assumption, that Matthew wrote for Hebrew Christians, Mark for Latins, and Luke for Gentiles in general,—we do not find any such consistency in these purposes, as a revision and alteration of another's narrative would necessarily presuppose. We have the visit of the Gentile Magi exclusively related by the Hebraizing Matthew;—the circumcision of the child Jesus, and His frequenting the passovers at Jerusalem, exclusively by the Gentile Evangelist Luke. Had the above purposes been steadily kept in view in the revision of the narratives before them, the respective Evangelists could not have omitted incidents so entirely subservient to their respective designs.

7. Our supposition (δ) is, that receiving the Gospel or Gospels before them as authentic, the Evangelists borrowed from them such parts as they purposed to narrate in common with them. But this does not represent the matter of fact. In no one case does any Evangelist borrow from another any considerable part of even a single narrative. For such borrowing would imply verbal coincidence, unless in the case of strong Hebraistic idiom, or other assignable peculiarity. It is inconceivable that one writer borrowing from another matter confessedly of the very first importance, in good faith and with approval, should alter his diction so singularly and capriciously as, on this hypothesis, we find the text of the parallel sections of our Gospels altered. Let the question be answered by ordinary considerations of probability, and let any passage common to the three Evangelists be put to the test. The phenomena presented will be much as follows:—first, perhaps, we shall have three, five, or more words identical;—then as many wholly distinct: then two clauses or more, expressed in the same words but differing order:—then a clause contained in one or two, and not in the third:—then several words identical:—then a clause not only wholly distinct but apparently inconsistent;—and so forth;—with recurrences of the same arbitrary and anomalous alterations, coincidences, and transpositions. Nor does this description apply to verbal and sentential arrangement only;—but also, with slight modification, to that of the larger portions of the narratives. Equally capricious would be the disposition of the subject-matter. Sometimes, while coincident in the things related, the Gospels place them in the most various order,—each in turn connecting them together with apparent marks of chronological sequence (e. g. the visit to Gadara in Matt. viii. 28 ff. as compared with the same in Mark v. 1 ff. Luke viii. 26 ff. and numerous other such instances noticed in the commentary). Let any one say, divesting himself of the commonly-received hypotheses respecting the connexion and order of our Gospels, whether it is within the range of probability that a writer should thus singularly and unreasonably alter the subject-matter and diction before him, having (as is now supposed) no design in so doing, but intending, fairly and with approval, to incorporate the work of another into his own? Can an instance be any where cited of undoubted borrowing and adaptation from another, presenting similar phenomena?²

² The examples cited from modern historians by Mr. Smith of Jordanhill, are not in point. In almost every one of those, reasons could be assigned for the adoption or rejection by the posterior writer of the words and clauses of the prior one. Let the student attempt such a rationale of any narrative common to the three Gospels, on any

8. I cannot then find in any of the above hypotheses a solution of the question before us, how the appearances presented by our three Gospels are to be accounted for. I do not see how any theory of mutual interdependence will leave to our three Evangelists their credit as able or trustworthy writers, or even as honest men: nor can I find any such theory borne out by the nature of the variations apparent in the respective texts.

SECTION III.

THE ORIGIN OF OUR THREE GOSPELS.

1. It remains then, that the three Gospels should have arisen independently of one another. But supposing this, we are at once met by the difficulty of accounting for so much common matter, and that narrated, as we have seen, with such curious verbal agreements and discrepancies. Thus we are driven to some common origin for those parts. But of what kind? Plainly, either documentary, or oral. Let us consider each of these in turn.

2. No documentary source could have led to the present texts of our Gospels. For supposing it to have been in the Aramaic language, and thus accounting for some of the variations in our parallel passages, as being independent translations,—we shall still have no solution whatever of the more important discrepancies of insertion, omission, and arrangement. To meet these, the most complicated hypotheses have been advanced³,—all perfectly capricious, and utterly inadequate, even when apprehended, to account for the phenomena. The various opponents of the view of an original Gospel have well shewn besides, that such a hypothesis of priority, and he will at once perceive its impracticability. If Matthew, Mark, and Luke are to be judged by the analogy of Suchet, Alison, and Napier, the inference must be, that whereas the historians were intelligent men, acting by the rules of mental association and selection, the Evangelists were mere victims of caprice, and such caprice as is hardly consistent with the possession of a sound mind.

³ It may be worth while, as an example, to state the nature of Bp. Marsh's hypothesis of the origin of our three Gospels. He supposes, 1) κ , the original Hebrew Gospel, 2) $\bar{\kappa}$ a Greek version of the same. 3) $\kappa + \alpha + A$, a volume containing a copy of the Hebrew original Gospel, accompanied by lesser (α) and greater (A) additions. 4) $\kappa + \beta + B$, another copy of ditto, accompanied by other lesser (β) and greater (B) additions. 5) $\kappa + \gamma + \Gamma$, a third copy of ditto, accompanied by a third set of lesser (γ) and greater (Γ) additions. 6) λ , a Hebrew gnomology (collection of sayings of the Lord), varying according to different copies.

Hence he holds our Gospels to have arisen: viz. the Hebrew Matthew, from $\kappa + \lambda + \alpha + A + \gamma + \Gamma$:—Luke, from $\kappa + \lambda + \beta + B + \gamma + \Gamma + \bar{\kappa}$:—Mark, from $\kappa + \alpha + A + \beta + B + \bar{\kappa}$: the Greek Matthew, to be a translation from the Hebrew Matt., with the collation of $\bar{\kappa}$, and of Luke and Mark. This is only one of the various arrangements made by the supporters of this hypothesis. For those of Eichhorn, Gratz, &c., see Meyer's Comment. vol. i. Einleitung, pp. 25—27.

Gospel could never have existed, because of the omission in one or other of our three, of passages which must necessarily have formed a part of it; e. g. Matt. xxvi. 6—13 (see there) omitted by Luke⁴. I believe then that we may safely abandon the idea of any single original Gospel, whether Aramaic or Greek.

3. Still it might be thought possible that, though one document cannot have originated the text of the common parts of our Gospels, several documents, more or less related to one another, may have done so, in the absence of any original Gospel. But this, it will be seen, is but an imperfect analysis of their origin; for we are again met by the question, whence did these documents take their rise? And if they turn out to be only so many modifications of a received oral teaching respecting the actions and sayings of our Lord, then to that oral teaching are we referred back for a more complete account of the matter. That such evangelical documents did exist, I think highly probable; and believe I recognize such in some of the peculiar sections of Luke; but that the common parts of our Gospels, even if taken from such, are to be traced back further, I am firmly convinced.

4. We come then to enquire, whether the common sections of our Gospels could have originated from a common oral source. If by this latter is to be understood,—one and the same oral teaching every where recognized, our answer must be in the negative: for the difficulties of verbal discrepancy, varying arrangement, insertion, and omission, would, as above, remain unaccounted for. At the same time, it is highly improbable that such a course of oral teaching should ever have been adopted. Let us examine the matter more in detail.

5. The Apostles were witnesses of the resurrection of the Lord Jesus. In this consisted their especial office and work. Others besides them had been companions of our Lord:—but peculiar grace and power was given to them, by which they gave forth their testimony (Acts iv. 33). And what this testimony included, we learn from the conditions of apostleship propounded by Peter himself, Acts i. 21, 22: that in order to its being properly given, an Apostle must have been an eye and ear witness of what had happened from the baptism of John until the ascen-

⁴ Those who maintain the anointing of Matt. xxvi. 6 to be the same with that of Luke vii. 36, forget that it is incumbent on them in such cases to shew sufficient reason for the inversion in order of time. It is no reply to my argument, to say that Luke omits the anointing at Bethany, because he had related it before in ch. vii. Had he not had Matthew's Gospel before him, it is very likely that he may have inserted an incident which he found without date, in a place where it might illustrate the want of charity of a Pharisee: but having (on their hypothesis) Matthew's Gospel before him, and the incident being there related in strict sequence and connexion with our Lord's Death, it is simply inconceivable that he should have transposed it, and obliterated all trace of such connexion, deeply interesting and important as it is.

sion : i. e. during the whole official life of our Lord. With the whole of this matter, therefore, was his apostolic testimony concerned. And we are consequently justified in assuming that the substance of the teaching of the Apostles consisted of their testimony to such facts, given in the Holy Ghost and with power. The ordinary objection to this view, that their extant discourses do not contain Evangelic narrations, but are hortatory and persuasive, is wholly inapplicable. Their extant discourses are contained in the Acts, a second work of the Evangelist Luke, who having in his former treatise given all which he had been able to collect of their narrative teaching, was not likely again to repeat it. Besides which, such narrative teaching would occur, not in general and almost wholly apologetic discourses held before assembled unbelievers, but in the building up of the several churches and individual converts, and in the catechization of catechumens. It is a strong confirmation of this view, that Luke himself in his preface refers to this original apostolic narrative as the source of the various διηγήσεις which many had taken in hand to draw up, and states his object in writing to be, that Theophilus might know the certainty (ἀσφάλειαν) of those sayings concerning which he had been catechized.

It is another confirmation of the above view of the testimony of the apostolic body,—that Paul claims to have received an independent knowledge, by direct revelation, of at least some of the fundamental parts of the Gospel history (see Gal. i. 12 : 1 Cor. xi. 23 ; xv. 3), to qualify him for his calling as an Apostle.

6. I believe then that the Apostles, in virtue not merely of their having been eye and ear witnesses of the Evangelic history, but especially of their office, gave to the various Churches their testimony in a narrative of facts: such narrative being modified in each case by the individual mind of the Apostle himself, and his sense of what was requisite for the particular community to which he was ministering. While they were principally together, and instructing the converts at Jerusalem, such narrative would naturally be for the most part the same, and expressed in the same, or nearly the same words: coincident however not from design or rule, but because the things themselves were the same, and the teaching naturally fell for the most part into one form. It would be easy and interesting to follow the probable origin and growth of this cycle of narratives of the words and deeds of our Lord in the Church at Jerusalem,—for both the Jews, and the Hellenists,—the latter under such teachers as Philip and Stephen, commissioned and authenticated by the Apostles. In the course of such a process some portions would naturally be written down by private believers, for their own use or that of friends. And as the Church spread to Samaria, Cæsarea, and Antioch, the want would be felt in each of these places, of similar cycles of oral teaching, which when supplied would thenceforward belong to and be current in those respective Churches. And these portions of the Evangelic history, oral or partially documentary, would be adopted under the sanction of the Apostles, who were as in all things, so especially in this, the appointed and divinely-guided overseers of the whole Church. This common substratum of apostolic teaching,—never formally adopted by all, but subject to all the varieties of diction and arrangement, addition and omission, incident to transmission through many individual minds, and into many different localities,—I believe to have been the original source of the common part of our three Gospels.

7. Whether this teaching was wholly or in part expressed originally in Greek, may admit of some question. That it would very soon be so expressed, follows as a matter of course from the early mention of Hellenistic converts, Acts vi., and the subsequent reception of the Gentiles into the Church; and it seems to have been generally received in that language, before any of its material modifications arose. This I gather from the remarkable verbal coincidences observable in the present Greek texts. Then again, the verbal discrepancies of our present Greek texts entirely forbid us to imagine that our Evangelists took up the usual oral teaching at one place or time; but point to a process of alteration and deflection, which will now engage our attention.

8. It will be observed that I am now speaking of those sections which our Gospels possess IN COMMON, and WITHOUT REFERENCE TO THEIR ORDER. The larger additions, which are due to peculiar sources of information,—the narratives of the same event which have not sprung from a common source,—the different arrangement of the common sections, with all these I am not now concerned.

9. The matter then of those sections I believe to have been this generally-received oral narrative of the Apostles of which I have spoken. Delivered, usually in the same or similar terms, to the catechumens in the various Churches, and becoming the text of instruction for their pastors and teachers, it by degrees underwent those modifications which the various Gospels now present to us. And I am not now speaking of any considerable length of time, such as might suffice to deteriorate and corrupt mere traditional teaching,—but of no more than the transmission through men apostolic or almost apostolic, yet of independent habits of speech and thought,—of an account which remained in substance the same. Let us imagine the modifications which the individual memory, brooding affectionately and reverently over each word and act of our Lord, would introduce into a narrative in relating it variously and under differing circumstances:—the Holy Spirit, who brought to their remembrance whatever things He had said to them (John xiv. 26), working in and distributing to each severally as He would;—let us place to the account the various little changes of transposition or omission, of variation in diction or emphasis, which would be sure to arise in the freedom of individual teaching,—and we have I believe the only reasonable solution of the arbitrary and otherwise unaccountable coincidences and discrepancies in these parts of our Gospels.

10. It might perhaps be required that some presumptive corroborations should be given of such a supposition as that here advanced. For the materials of such, we must look into the texts themselves of such sections. And in them I think I see signs of such a process as the latter part of paragraph 9 describes. For,

11. It is a well-known and natural effect of oral transmission, that while the less prominent members of a sentence are transposed, or diminished or increased in number, and common-place expressions replaced by their synonymes, any unusual word, or harsh expression, or remarkable construction is retained. Nor is this only the case, such words, expressions, or constructions, preserving their relative places in the sentences, —but, from the mind laying hold of them, and retaining them at all events, they are sometimes found preserved near their original places, though perhaps with altered relations and import. Now a careful observation of the text of the Gospels will continually bring before the reader instances of both of these. I have subjoined in a note a few, more to tempt the student to follow the track, than to give any adequate illustration of these remarks ⁵.

12. With regard to those parts of our Gospels which do not fall under the above remarks, there are various conceivable sources whence they may have arisen. As each Evangelist may have had more or less access to those who were themselves witnesses of the events, whether before or during the public ministry of our Lord, or as each may have fallen in with a more complete or a shorter account of those events, so have our narratives been filled out with rich detail, or confined to the mere statement of occurrences:—so have they been copious and entire in their history, or have merely taken up and handed down a portion of our Lord's life. These particulars will come under our notice below, when we treat of each Gospel by itself.

13. The above view has been impugned by Mr. Birks (Horæ Evangelicæ, &c. Lond. 1852), and Mr. Smith of Jordanhill (Dissertation on the Origin and Connexion of the Gospels: Edinb. 1853). While maintaining different hypotheses, both agree in regarding 'oral tradition' as quite insufficient to account for the phenomena of approximation to identity which are found in the Gospels. But both, as it seems to me, have forgotten to take into account the peculiar kind of oral tradition with which we are here concerned. Both concur in insisting on the many variations and corruptions to which oral transmission is liable, as an objection to my hypothesis. But we have here a case in this respect exceptional and sui generis. The oral tradition (or rather ORAL TEACHING) with which we are concerned, formed the substance of a deliberate and careful testimony to facts of the highest possible importance, and as such, was inculcated in daily catechization: whereas common oral tradition is careless and vague, not being similarly guarded, nor diffused as matter of earnest instruction. Besides which, these writers forget, that I have maintained the probability of a very early collection of portions of such oral teaching into documents, some of which two or even three Evangelists may have used; and these documents or διδασκαλίαι, in some cases drawn up after the first minute verbal divergences had taken place, or being translations from common Aramaic sources, would furnish many of the phenomena which Mr. Smith so ingeniously illustrates from translation in modern historians and newspapers. I have found reason to infer, Vol. II., Prolegg. p. 14, that St. Luke was acquainted with Hebrew; and he would therefore be an independent translator, as well as the other two Evangelists.

14. For the sake of guarding against misunderstanding, it may be well formally to state the conclusion at which I have arrived respecting the origin of our three first Gospels: in which, I may add, I have been much confirmed by the thorough revision of the text rendered necessary in preparing each of these later editions, and indeed by all my observation since the first publication of these prolegomena:

That the synoptic Gospels contain the substance of the Apostles' testimony, collected principally from their oral teaching current in the Church,—partly also from written documents embodying portions of that teaching: that there is however no reason from their internal structure to believe, but every reason to disbelieve, that any one of the three Evangelists had access to either of the other two Gospels in its present form.

SECTION IV.

THE DISCREPANCIES, APPARENT AND REAL, OF THE THREE GOSPELS.

1. In our three narratives, many events and sayings do not hold the same relative place in one as in another: and hence difficulties have arisen, and the faith of some has been weakened; while the adversaries of our religion have made the most of these differences to impugn the veracity of the writers themselves. And hence also Christian commentators have been driven to a system of harmonizing which condescends to adopt the weakest compromises, and to do the utmost violence to probability and fairness, in its zeal for the veracity of the Evangelists. It becomes important therefore critically to discriminate between real and apparent discrepancy, and while with all fairness we acknowledge the former where it exists, to lay down certain common-sense rules whereby the latter may be also ascertained.

2. The real discrepancies between our Evangelistic histories are very few, and those nearly all of one kind. They are simply the results of the entire independence of the accounts. They consist mainly in different chronological arrangements, expressed or implied. Such for instance is the transposition, before noticed, of the history of the passage into the country of the Gadarenes, which in Matt. viii. 28 ff. precedes a whole course of events which in Mark v. 1 ff.: Luke viii. 26 ff. it follows. Such again is the difference in position between the pair of incidents related Matt. viii. 19—22, and the same pair of incidents found in Luke ix. 57—61. And such are some other varieties of arrangement and position which will be brought before the readers of the following Commentary. Now the way of dealing with such discrepancies has been twofold,—as remarked above. The enemies of the faith have of course recognized them, and pushed them to the utmost; often attempting to create them where they do not exist, and where they do, using them to overthrow the narrative in which they occur. While this has been their course,—equally unworthy of the Evangelists and their subject has been that of those who are usually thought the orthodox Harmonists. They have usually taken upon them to state, that such variously placed narratives do not refer to the same incidents, and so to save (as they imagine) the credit of the Evangelists, at the expense of common fairness and candour. Who, for example, can for a moment doubt that the pairs of incidents above cited from Matthew and Luke are identical with each other? What man can ever suppose that the same offer would have been, not merely twice made to our Lord in the same words and similarly answered by Him (for this is very possible), but actually followed in both cases by a request from another disciple, couched also in the very same words? The reiterated sequence of the two is absolutely out of all bounds of probability:—and yet it is supposed and maintained by one of the ablest of our modern Harmonists. And this is only one specimen out of very many of the same kind, notices of which may be seen in the following Commentary.

3. The fair Christian critic will pursue a plan different from both these. With no desire to create discrepancies, but rather every desire truthfully and justly to solve them, if it may be,—he will candidly recognize them where they unquestionably exist. By this he loses nothing, and the Evangelists lose nothing. That one great and glorious portrait of our Lord should be harmoniously depicted by them,—that the procession of events by which our redemption is assured to us should be one and the same in all,—is surely more wonderful, and more plainly the work of God's Holy Spirit, the more entirely independent of each other they must be inferred to have been. Variation in detail and arrangement is to my mind the most valuable proof that they were, not mere mouthpieces or organs of the Holy Spirit, as some would suicidally make them, but holy men, under His inspiration. I shall treat of this part of our subject more at length below (in § vi.) :—I mention it now, to shew that we need not be afraid to recognize real discrepancies, in the spirit of fairness and truth. Christianity never was, and never can be the gainer, by any concealment, warping, or avoidance of the plain truth, wherever it is to be found.

4. On the other hand, the Christian critic will fairly discriminate between real and apparent discrepancy. And in order to this, some rules must be laid down by which the limits of each may be determined.

5. Similar incidents must not be too hastily assumed to be the same. If one Evangelist had given us the feeding of the five thousand, and another that of the four, we should have been strongly tempted to pronounce the incidents the same, and to find a discrepancy in the accounts:—but our conclusion would have been false :—for we have now both events narrated by each of two Evangelists (Matthew and Mark), and formally alluded to by our Lord Himself in connexion. (Matt. xvi. 9, 10. Mark viii. 19, 20.) And there are several narrations now in our Gospels, the identification of which must be abstained from; e. g. the anointing of our Lord by the woman who was a sinner, Luke vii. 36 ff., and that at Bethany by Mary the sister of Lazarus, in Matt. xxvi. 6 ff.: Mark xiv. 3 ff.: John xi. 2; xii. 3 ff. In such cases we must judge fairly and according to probability,—not making trifling differences in diction or narrative into important reasons why the incidents should be different;—but rather examining critically the features of the incidents themselves, and discerning and determining upon the evidence furnished by them.

6. The circumstances and nature of our Lord's discourses must be taken into account. Judging à priori, the probability is, that He repeated most of His important sayings many times over, with more or less variation, to different audiences, but in the hearing of the same apostolic witnesses. If now these witnesses by their independent narratives have originated our present Gospels, what can be more likely than that these sayings should have found their way into the Gospels in various forms,—sometimes, as especially in Matt., in long and strictly coherent discourses,—sometimes scattered up and down, as is the matter of several of Matthew's discourses in Luke? Yet such various reports of our Lord's sayings are most unreasonably by some of the modern German critics (e. g. De Wette) treated as discrepancies, and used to prove Matthew's discourses to have been mere arrangements of shorter sayings uttered at different times. A striking instance of the repetition by our Lord of similar discourses varied according to the time and the hearers, may be found in the denunciations on the Scribes and Pharisees as uttered during the journey to Jerusalem, Luke xi. 37 ff., and the subsequent solemn and public reiteration of them in Jerusalem at the final close of the Lord's ministry in Matt. xxiii. Compare also the parable of the pounds, Luke xix. 11 ff., with that of the talents, Matt. xxv. 14 ff., and in fact the whole of the discourses during the last journey in Luke, with their parallels, where such exist, in Matthew.

SECTION V.

THE FRAGMENTARY NATURE OF THE THREE GOSPELS.

1. On any hypothesis which attributes to our Evangelists the design of producing a complete history of the life and actions of our Lord, and gives two of them the advantage of consulting other records of the same kind with their own,—the omissions in their histories are perfectly inexplicable. For example,—Matthew, as an Apostle, was himself an eye-witness of the Ascension, an event holding a most important place in the Divine process of the redemption of man. Yet he omits all record or mention of it. And though this is the most striking example, others are continually occurring throughout the three Gospels. Why has there been no mention in them of the most notable miracle wrought by our Lord,—which indeed, humanly speaking, was the final exciting cause of that active enmity of the Jewish rulers which issued in His crucifixion? Can it be believed, that an Apostle, writing in the fulness of his know- ledge as such, and with the design of presenting to his readers Jesus of Nazareth as the promised Messiah,—should have omitted all mention of the raising of Lazarus,—and of the subsequent prophecy of Caiaphas, whereby that Messiahship was so strongly recognized? The ordinary supposition, of silence being maintained for prudential reasons concerning Lazarus and his family, is quite beside the purpose. For the sacred books of the Christians were not published to the world in general, but were reserved and precious possessions of the believing societies: and even had this been otherwise, such concealment was wholly alien from their spirit and character.

2. The absence of completeness from our Gospels is even more strikingly shewn in their minor omissions, which cannot on any supposition be accounted for, if their authors had possessed records of the incidents so omitted. Only in the case of Luke does there appear to have been any design of giving a regular account of things throughout: and from his many omissions of important matter contained in Matthew, it is plain that his sources of information were, though copious, yet fragmentary. For, assuming what has been above inferred as to the independence of our three Evangelists, it is inconceivable that Luke, with his avowed design of completeness, ch. i. 3, should have been in possession of matter so important as that contained in those parts of Matthew, and should deliberately have excluded it from his Gospel.

3. The Gospel of Mark,—excluding from that term the venerable and authentic fragment at the end of ch. xvi.,—terminates abruptly in the midst of the narrative of incidents connected with the resurrection of our Lord. And, with the exception of the short prefatory compendium, ch. i. 1—13, there is no reason for supposing this Evangelist to be an abbreviator, in any sense, of the matter before him. His sources of information were of the very highest order, and his descriptions and narratives are most life-like and copious; but they were confined within a certain cycle of apostolic teaching, viz. that which concerned the official life of our Lord: and in that cycle not complete, inasmuch as he breaks off short of the Ascension, which another Evangelistic hand has added from apostolic sources.

SECTION VI.

THE INSPIRATION OF THE EVANGELISTS AND OTHER N. T. WRITERS.

1. The results of our enquiries hitherto may be thus stated:—That our three Gospels have arisen independently of one another, from sources of information possessed by the Evangelists;—such sources of information, for a very considerable part of their contents, being the narrative teaching of the Apostles ; and, in cases where their personal testimony was out of the question, oral or documentary narratives, preserved in and received by the Christian Church in the apostolic age ;—that the three Gospels are not formal complete accounts of the whole incidents of the sacred history, but each of them fragmentary, containing such portions of it as fell within the notice, or the special design, of the Evangelist.

2. The important question now comes before us, In what sense are the Evangelists to be regarded as having been inspired by the Holy Spirit of God ? That they were so, in some sense, has been the concurrent belief of the Christian body in all ages. In the second, as in the nineteenth century, the ultimate appeal, in matters of fact and doctrine, has been to these venerable writings. It may be well then first to enquire on what grounds their authority has been rated so high by all Christians.

3. And I believe the answer to this question will be found to be, Because they are regarded as authentic documents, descending from the apostolic age, and presenting to us the substance of the apostolic testimony. The Apostles being raised up for the special purpose of witnessing to the Gospel history,—and these memoirs having been universally received in the early Church as embodying that their testimony, I see no escape left from the inference, that they come to us with inspired authority. The Apostles themselves, and their contemporaries in the ministry of the Word, were singularly endowed with the Holy Spirit for the founding and teaching of the Church : and Christians of all ages have accepted the Gospels and other writings of the New Testament as the written result of the Pentecostal effusion. The early Church was not likely to be deceived in this matter. The reception of the Gospels was immediate and universal. They never were placed for a moment by the consent of Christians in the same category with the spurious documents which soon sprung up after them. In external history, as in internal character, they differ entirely from the apocryphal Gospels ; which though in some cases bearing the name and pretending to contain the teaching of an Apostle, were never recognized as apostolic.

4. Upon the authenticity, i. e. the apostolicity of our Gospels, rests their claim to inspiration. Containing the substance of the Apostles' testimony, they carry with them that special power of the Holy Spirit which rested on the Apostles in virtue of their office, and also on other teachers and preachers of the first age. It may be well then to enquire of what kind that power was, and how far extending.

5. We do not find the Apostles transformed, from being men of individual character and thought and feeling, into mere channels for the transmission of infallible truth. We find them, humanly speaking, to have been still distinguished by the same characteristics as before the descent of the Holy Ghost. We see Peter still ardent and impetuous, still shrinking from the danger of human disapproval;—we see John still exhibiting the same union of deep love and burning zeal;—we find them pursuing different paths of teaching, exhibiting different styles of writing, taking hold of the truth from different sides.

6. Again, we do not find the Apostles put in possession at once of the divine counsel with regard to the Church. Though Peter and John were full of the Holy Ghost immediately after the Ascension, neither at that time, nor for many years afterwards, were they put in possession of the purpose of God regarding the Gentiles, which in due time was specially revealed to Peter, and recognized in the apostolic council at Jerusalem.

7. These considerations serve to shew us in what respects the working of the Holy Spirit on the sacred writers was analogous to His influence on every believer in Christ; viz. in the retention of individual character and thought and feeling,—and in the gradual development of the ways and purposes of God to their minds.

8. But their situation and office was peculiar and unexampled. And for its fulfilment, peculiar and unexampled gifts were bestowed upon them. One of these, which bears very closely upon our present subject, was, the recalling by the Holy Spirit of those things which the Lord had said to them. This was His own formal promise, recorded in John xiv. 26. And if we look at our present Gospels, we see abundant evidence of its fulfilment. What unassisted human memory could treasure up saying and parable, however deep the impression at the time, and report them in full at the distance of several years, as we find them reported, with every internal mark of truthfulness, in our Gospels? What invention of man could have devised discourses which by common consent differ from all sayings of men—which possess this character unaltered notwithstanding their transmission through men of various mental organization—which contain things impossible to be understood or appreciated by their reporters at the time when they profess to have been uttered—which enwrap the seeds of all human improvement yet attained, and are evidently full of power for more? I refer to this latter alternative only to remark, that all considerations, whether of the Apostles' external circumstances, or their internal feelings respecting Him of whom they bore witness, combine to confirm the persuasion of Christians, that they have recorded as said by our Lord what He truly did say, and not any words of their own imagination.

9. And let us pursue the matter further by analogy. Can we suppose that the light poured by the Holy Spirit upon the sayings of our Lord would be confined to such sayings, and not extend itself over the other parts of the narrative of His life on earth? Can we believe that those miracles, which though not uttered in words, were yet acted parables, would not be, under the same gracious assistance, brought back to the minds of the Apostles, so that they should be placed on record for the teaching of the Church?

10. And, going yet further, to those parts of the Gospels which were wholly out of the cycle of the Apostles' own testimony,—can we imagine that the divine discrimination which enabled them to detect the 'lie to the Holy Ghost,' should have forsaken them in judging of the records of our Lord's birth and infancy,—so that they should have taught or sanctioned an apocryphal, fabulous, or mythical account of such matters? Some account of them must have been current in the apostolic circle; for Mary the Mother of Jesus survived the Ascension, and would be fully capable of giving undoubted testimony to the facts. (See notes on Luke i. ii.) Can we conceive then that, with her among them, the Apostles should have delivered other than a true history of these things? Can we suppose that Luke's account, which he includes among the things delivered by those who were eye-witnesses and ministers of the word from the first, is other than the true one, and stamped with the authority of the witnessing and discriminating Spirit dwelling in the Apostles? Can we suppose that the account in the still more immediately apostolic Gospel of Matthew is other than the same history seen from a different side and independently narrated?

11. But if it be enquired, how far such divine superintendence has extended in the framing of our Gospels as we at present find them, the answer must be furnished by no preconceived idea of what ought to have been, but by the contents of the Gospels themselves. That those contents are various, and variously arranged, is token enough, that in their selection and disposition we have human agency presented to us, under no more direct divine guidance, in this respect, than that general leading, which in main and essential points should ensure entire accordance. Such leading admits of much variety in points of minor consequence. Two men may be equally led by the Holy Spirit to record the events of our Lord's life for our edification, though one may believe and record, that the visit to the Gadarenes took place before the calling of Matthew, while the other places it after that event; though one in narrating it speaks of two dæmoniacks,—the other, only of one.

12. And it is observable that in the only place in the three Gospels where an Evangelist speaks of himself, he expressly lays claim, not to any supernatural guidance in the arrangement of his subject-matter, but to a diligent tracing down of all things from the first; in other words, to the care and accuracy of a faithful and honest compiler. After such an avowal on the part of the editor himself, to assert an immediate revelation to him of the arrangement to be adopted and the chronological notices to be given, is clearly not justified, according to his own shewing and assertion*. The value of such arrangement and chronological connexion must depend on various circumstances in each case:—on their definiteness and consistency,—on their agreement or disagreement with the other extant records; the preference being in each case given to that one whose account is the most minute in details, and whose notes of sequence are the most distinct.

13. In thus speaking, I am doing no more than even the most scrupulous of our Harmonizers have in fact done. In the case alluded to in paragraph 11, there is not one of them who has not altered the arrangement, either of Matthew, or of Mark, and Luke, so as to bring the visit to the Gadarenes into the same part of the Evangelic History. But, if the arrangement itself were matter of divine inspiration, then have we no right to vary it in the slightest degree, but must maintain (as the Harmonists have done in other cases, but never, that I am aware, in this) two distinct visits to have been made at different times, and nearly the same events to have occurred at both. I need hardly add that a similar method of proceeding with all the variations in the Gospels, which would on this supposition be necessary, would render the Scripture narrative a heap of improbabilities; and strengthen, instead of weakening, the cause of the enemies of our faith.

14. And not only of the arrangement of the Evangelic History are these remarks to be understood. There are certain minor points of accuracy or inaccuracy, of which human research suffices to inform men, and on which, from want of that research, it is often the practice to speak vaguely and inexactly. Such are sometimes the conventionally received distances from place to place; such are the common accounts of phenomena in natural history, &c. Now in matters of this kind, the Evangelists and Apostles were not supernaturally informed, but left, in common with others, to the guidance of their natural faculties.

15. The same may be said of citations and dates from history. In the last apology of Stephen, which he spoke being full of the Holy Ghost, and with divine influence beaming from his countenance, we have at least two demonstrable historical inaccuracies. And the occurrence of similar ones in the Gospels does not in any way affect the inspiration or the veracity of the Evangelists.

16. It may be well to mention one notable illustration of the principles upheld in this section. What can be more undoubted and unani-

* To suppose St. Luke to have written ἰδοὺς πάντοι, κ.τ.λ. if he were under the conscious inspiration of the Holy Spirit, superseding all his own mental powers and faculties, would be to charge him with ascribing to his own diligence and selection that which was furnished to him independently of both. Yet to this are the assertors of verbal inspiration committed.

mous than the testimony of the Evangelists to THE RESURRECTION OF THE LORD? If there be one fact rather than another of which the Apostles were witnesses, it was this : and in the concurrent narrative of all four Evangelists it stands related beyond all cavil or question. Yet of all the events which they have described, none is so variously put forth in detail, or with so many minor discrepancies. And this was just what might have been expected, on the principles above laid down. The great fact that the Lord was risen,—set forth by the ocular witness of the Apostles, who had seen Him,—became from that day first in importance in the delivery of their testimony. The precise order of His appearances would naturally, from the overwhelming nature of their present emotions, be a matter of minor consequence, and perhaps not even of accurate enquiry till some time had passed. Then, with the utmost desire on the part of the women and Apostles to collect the events in their exact order of time, some confusion would be apparent in the history, and some discrepancies in versions of it which were the results of separate and independent enquiries ;—the traces of which pervade our present accounts. But what fair-judging student of the Gospels ever made these variations or discrepancies a ground for doubting the veracity of the Evangelists as to the fact of the Resurrection, or the principal details of the Lord's appearances after it?

17. It will be well to state the bearing of the opinions advanced in this section on two terms in common use, viz. verbal, and plenary inspiration.

18. With regard to verbal inspiration, I take the sense of it, as explained by its most strenuous advocates, to be, that every word and phrase of the Scriptures is absolutely and separately true,—and, whether narrative, or discourse, took place, or was said, in every most exact particular as set down. Much might be said of the à priori unworthiness of such a theory, as applied to a Gospel whose character is the freedom of the Spirit, not the bondage of the letter : but it belongs more to my present work to try it by applying it to the Gospels as we have them. And I do not hesitate to say, that being thus applied, its effect will be to destroy altogether the credibility of our Evangelists. Hardly a single instance of parallelism between them arises, where they do not relate the same thing indeed in substance, but expressed in terms which if literally taken are incompatible with each other. To cite only one obvious instance. The Title over the Cross was written in Greek. According then to the verbal-inspiration theory, each Evangelist has recorded the exact words of the inscription ; not the general sense, but the inscription itself,—not a letter less or more. This is absolutely necessary to the theory. Its advocates must not be allowed, with convenient inconsistency, to take refuge in a common-sense view of the matter wherever their theory fails them, and still to uphold it in the main⁷. And how it will here apply, the following comparison will shew:—

Matt., οὗτός ἐστιν ἰησοῦς ὁ βασιλεὺς τῶν ἰουδαίων.

Mark, ὁ βασιλεὺς τῶν ἰουδαίων.

Luke, ὁ βασιλεὺς τῶν ἰουδαίων οὗτος.

John, ἰησοῦς ὁ ναζωραῖος ὁ βασιλεὺς τῶν ἰουδαίων.

19. Another objection to the theory is, that if it be so, the Christian world is left in uncertainty what her Scriptures are, as long as the sacred text is full of various readings. Some one manuscript must be pointed out to us, which carries the weight of verbal inspiration, or some text whose authority shall be undoubted, must be promulgated. But manifestly neither of these things can ever happen. To the latest age, the reading of some important passages will be matter of doubt in the Church: and, which is equally subversive of the theory, though not of equal importance in itself, there is hardly a sentence in the whole of the Gospels in which there are not varieties of diction in our principal MSS., baffling all attempts to decide which was its original form.

20. The fact is, that this theory uniformly gives way before intelligent study of the Scriptures themselves; and is only held, consistently and thoroughly, by those who have never undertaken that study. When put forth by those who have, it is never carried fairly through; but while broadly asserted, is in detail abandoned.

21. If I understand plenary inspiration rightly, I hold it to the utmost, as entirely consistent with the opinions expressed in this section. The inspiration of the sacred writers I believe to have consisted in the fulness of the influence of the Holy Spirit specially raising them to, and enabling them for, their work,—in a manner which distinguishes them from all other writers in the world, and their work from all other works. The men were full of the Holy Ghost—the books are the pouring out of that fulness through the men,—the conservation of the treasure in earthen vessels. The treasure is ours, in all its richness: but it is ours as only it can be ours,—in the imperfections of human speech, in the limitations of human thought, in the variety incident first to individual character, and then to manifold transcription and the lapse of ages.

22. Two things, in concluding this section, I would earnestly impress on my readers. First, that we must take our views of inspiration not, as is too often done, from a priori considerations, but ENTIRELY FROM THE EVIDENCE FURNISHED BY THE SCRIPTURES THEMSELVES: and secondly, that the MEN WERE INSPIRED, the BOOKS are the RESULTS OF THAT INSPIRATION. This latter consideration, if all that it implies be duly weighed, will furnish us with the key to the whole question.

⁷ This has been done, as far as I have seen, in all remarks of verbal-inspirationists on this part of my Prolegomena.—Sept. 1862.

SECTION VII.

IMPRACTICABILITY OF CONSTRUCTING A FORMAL HARMONY OF THE THREE GOSPELS.

1. From very early times attempts have been made to combine the narratives of our three Gospels into one continuous history. As might have been expected, however, from the characteristics of those Gospels above detailed, such Harmonies could not be constructed without doing considerable violence to the arrangement of some one or more of the three, and an arbitrary adoption of the order of some one, to which then the others have been fitted and conformed. An examination of any of the current Harmonies will satisfy the student that this has been the case.

2. Now on the supposition that the three Gospels had arisen one out of the other, with a design such as any of those which have been previously discussed (with the exception of ϵ) in § ii. 2, 3, such a Harmony not only ought to be possible, but should arise naturally out of the several narratives without any forcing, or alteration of arrangement. Nay, on the supplementary theory of Greswell and others, the last written Gospel should itself be such a History as the Harmonizers are in search of. Now not only is this not the case, but their Harmonies contain the most violent and considerable transpositions:—they are obliged to have recourse to the most arbitrary hypotheses of repetition of events and discourses,—and after all, their Harmonies, while some difficulties would be evaded by their adoption, entail upon us others even more weighty and inexplicable.

3. Taking, however, the view of the origin of the Gospels above advocated, the question of the practicability of Harmonizing is simply reduced to one of matter of fact:—how far the three Evangelists, in relating the events of a history which was itself one and the same, have presented us with the same side of the narrative of those events, or with fragments which will admit of being pieced into one another.

4. And there is no doubt that, as far as the main features of the Evangelic history are concerned, a harmonious whole is presented to us by the combined narrative. The great events of our Lord's ministry, His baptism, His temptation, His teaching by discourses and miracles, His selection of the Twelve, His transfiguration, His announcement of His sufferings, death, and resurrection, His last journey to Jerusalem, His betrayal, His passion, crucifixion, burial, and resurrection,—these are common to all; and as far as they are concerned, their narratives naturally fall into accordance and harmony. But when we come to range their texts side by side, to supply clause with clause, and endeavour to construct a complete History of details out of them, we at once find ourselves involved in the difficulties above enumerated. And the inference which an unbiassed mind will thence draw is, that as the Evangelists wrote with no such design of being pieced together into a complete History, but delivered the apostolic testimony as they had received it, modified by individual character and oral transmission, and arranged carefully according to the best of their knowledge,—so we should thus simply and reverentially receive their records, without setting them at variance with each other by compelling them in all cases to say the same things of the same events.

5. If the Evangelists have delivered to us truly and faithfully the apostolic narratives, and if the Apostles spoke as the Holy Spirit enabled them, and brought events and sayings to their recollection, then we may be sure that if we knew the real process of the transactions themselves, that knowledge would enable us to give an account of the diversities of narration and arrangement which the Gospels now present to us. But without such knowledge, all attempts to accomplish this analysis in minute detail must be merely conjectural: and must tend to weaken the Evangelic testimony, rather than to strengthen it.

6. The only genuine Harmony of the Gospels will be furnished by the unity and consistency of the Christian's belief in their record, as true to the great events which it relates, and his enlightened and intelligent appreciation of the careful diligence of the Evangelists in arranging the important matter before them. If in that arrangement he finds variations, and consequently inaccuracies, on one side or the other, he will be content to acknowledge the analogy which pervades all the divine dealings with mankind, and to observe that God, who works, in the communication of His other gifts, through the medium of secondary agents,—has been pleased to impart to us this, the record of His most precious Gift, also by human agency and teaching. He will acknowledge also in this, the peculiar mercy and condescension of Him who has adapted to universal human reception the record of eternal life by His Son, by means of the very variety of individual recollections and modified reports. And thus he will arrive at the true Harmonistic view of Scripture; just as in the great and discordant world he does not seek peace by setting one thing against another and finding logical solution for all, but by holy and peaceful trust in that Almighty Father, who doeth all things well. So that the argument so happily applied by Butler to the nature of the Revelation contained in the Scriptures, may with equal justice be applied to the books themselves in which the record of that revelation is found,—that 'He who believes the Scriptures to have proceeded from Him who is the Author of nature, may well expect to find the same sort of difficulties in them, as are found in the constitution of nature.'

CHAPTER II.

OF THE GOSPEL ACCORDING TO MATTHEW.

SECTION I.

ITS AUTHORSHIP.

1. THE author of this Gospel has been universally believed to be, THE APOSTLE MATTHEW. With this belief the contents of the Gospel are not inconsistent; and we find it current in the very earliest ages (see testimonies in the next section).

2. Of the Apostle Matthew we know very little for certain. He was the son of Alphæus (Mark ii. 14), and therefore probably the brother of James the less. His calling, from being a publican to be one of the Twelve, is narrated by all three Evangelists. By Mark and Luke he is called Levi; in this Gospel, Matthew. Such change of name after becoming a follower of the Lord, was by no means uncommon; and the appearance of the apostolic, not the original name, in the Gospel proceeding from himself, is in analogy with the practice of Paul, who always in his Epistles speaks of himself by his new and Christian appellation. (On the doubts raised in ancient times respecting the identity of Matthew and Levi, see note on Matt. ix. 9.)

3. The Apostle Matthew is described by Clement of Alexandria* as belonging to the ascetic Judaistic school of early Christians. Nothing is known of his apostolic labours out of Palestine, which Eusebius mentions generally (ἐφ' ἑτέροις, Hist. Eccl. iii. 24). Later writers fix the scene of them in Ethiopia, but also include in their circle Macedonia, and several parts of Asia (Rufin. Hist. Eccl. x. 9. Socr. Hist. Eccl. i. 19). Heracleon, as cited by Clement of Alexandria, Strom. iv. 9, p. 595, relates that his death was natural. This is implicitly confirmed by Clement himself, and by Origen and Tertullian, who mention only Peter, Paul, and James the greater as martyrs among the Apostles.

* Ματθαῖος μὲν οὖν ὁ ἀπόστολος σπειρμάτων κ. ἀροδρῶν κ. λαχάνων ἀνεν κρεῶν μεταλάμβανεν, Ἰωάννης δὲ ὑπερτείνας τὴν ἱεράττειαν ἀκρίδας κ. μέλις ἔσθιεν ἀγριοῦ. Pædag. ii. 1, p. 174-5.

SECTION II.

ITS ORIGINAL LANGUAGE.

1. It has been much disputed among biblical scholars, whether this Gospel was originally composed in HEBREW (i. e. Syro-chaldaic, the vernacular language of the Hebrew Christians in Palestine) or in GREEK. I shall state the principal arguments on both sides, and give my own judgment on them.

A. Those who maintain a HEBREW original rest on the evidence of the early Church. And this evidence was unanimous. It mainly consists of the following testimonies :

(a) PAPIAS, bishop of Hierapolis in Phrygia in the beginning of the 2nd century. Eusebius thus describes him (H. E. iii. 36),—Παπίας, τῆς ἐν Ἱεραπόλει παροικίας καὶ αὐτὸς ἐπίσκοπος, ἀνὴρ τὰ πάντα ὅτι μάλιστα⁹ λογιώτατος καὶ γραφῆς εἰδήμων. He wrote five συγγράμματα, entitled λογίων κυριακῶν ἐξηγήσεις (ib. iii. 39) ; as Irenæus also states (Hæc. v. 33, p. 332),—where he calls him Ἰωάννου μὲν ἀκουστής, Πολυκάρπου δὲ ἰταῖρος γεγονώς, ἀρχαῖος ἀνὴρ. It is true that Eusebius asserts him, with reference to his adoption of chiliastic opinions, to have been σφόδρα σμικρὸς τὸν νοῦν (H. E. ibid.) : but this, it is alleged, cannot be brought to bear on the validity of his testimony to a matter of fact ; being only said controversially, and with regard to the adoption by Papias of apocryphal stories, and his belonging to a particular school of interpretation, from which Eusebius dissented. His testimony runs thus : Ματθαῖος μὲν οὖν ἐβραῖτι διαλέκτῳ τὰ λόγια συνετάξατο ἡρμηνεύσε δ' αὐτὰ ὡς εἰδύνατο (or ἦν δυνατός) ἑκαστος. That Papias meant by τὰ λόγια the Gospel of Matthew, not merely a collection of discourses, is probable, from his calling Mark's Gospel (apparently), σύνταξις τῶν κυριακῶν λογίων (Eus. ib.) : and from the title of his own work (see above). It would seem from the latter words of the above testimony, that Papias was not, at all events, aware of any authoritative contemporaneous version in Greek.

⁹ The author of the article on the first edition of this vol. in the Edinburgh Review, July, 1851, would render ἀνὴρ λογιώτατος 'a man full of anecdotes,' and thereby disparage Papias' testimony. But not to mention how inconsistent this is with the whole tenor of the passage in which the term occurs, which goes to exalt that testimony, the usage of λόγιος by Eusebius himself is decisive against the Reviewer. See, e. g., H. E. vi. 15 (of Origen), διανείμας τὰ πλήθη, τὸν Ἑρακλᾶν τῶν γνωρίμων προκρίνας, ἐν τοῖς θείοις σπουδαῖον, καὶ ἄλλως ὄντα λογιώτατον ἀνδρα κ. φιλοσοφίας οὐκ ἄμοιρον, καινωνδὸν καθίστη τῆς κατηχήσεως : ib. 20,—ἤμαζον δὲ κατὰ τοῦτο πλείους λόγιοι κ. ἐκκλησιαστικοὶ ἄνδρες, . . among whom he enumerates Beryllus of Bostra, Hippolytus, Gaius (λογιώτατος ἀνὴρ) : cf. also v. 16 (init.), vii. 7 (αὐτὸς αὐτὸς λόγιός τε καὶ θαυμάσιος). See Heinichen's note on the word in the passage cited in the text.

(β) IRENÆUS, Hær. iii. 1, p. 174: ὁ μὲν Ματθαῖος ἐν τοῖς Ἑβραίοις τῇ ἰδίᾳ διαλέκτῳ αὐτῶν καὶ γραφὴν ἐξήνεγκεν εὐαγγελίου, τοῦ Πέτρου καὶ τοῦ Παύλου ἐν Ῥώμῃ εὐαγγελιζομένων καὶ θεμελιούντων τὴν ἐκκλησίαν. Not a word is here said of Papias: indeed, by the last clause, this testimony, it is said, manifestly rests on independent ground. That such a note of time should have been, as has been supposed (Edin. Rev. July 1851, p. 38), a calculation of Irenæus himself, is inconceivable.

(γ) EUSEBIUS, H. E. v. 10, relates of Pantænus, ὁ Πάνταινος καὶ εἰς Ἰνδοὺς ἐλθεῖν λέγεται, ἔνθα λόγος εὐρεῖν αὐτὸν προφθάσαν τὴν αὐτοῦ παρουσίαν τὸ κατὰ Ματθαῖον εὐαγγέλιον παρὰ τισιν αὐτόθι τὸν χριστὸν ἐπεγνωκόσιν, οἷς Βαρβολομαῖον τῶν ἀποστόλων ἕνα κηρύξαι, αὐτοῖς τε Ἑβραίων γράμμασι τὴν τοῦ Ματθαίου καταλείψαι γραφὴν, ἣν καὶ σώζεσθαι εἰς τὸν δηλούμενον χρόνον. This tradition recognizes a Hebrew Gospel according to Matthew, and thus agrees with the testimonies before cited.

(δ) ORIGEN, Comm. in Matt. tom. i., preserved in Eus. H. E. vi. 25, describes himself as ἐν παραδόσει μαθὼν περὶ τῶν τεσσάρων εὐαγγελίων ἃ καὶ μόνα ἀναντιρρήτᾳ ἐστὶν ἐν τῇ ὑπὸ τὸν οὐρανὸν ἐκκλησίᾳ τοῦ θεοῦ, ὅτι πρῶτον μὲν γέγραπται τὸ κατὰ τὸν ποτὲ τελώνην, ὕστερον δὲ ἀπόστολον Ἰησοῦ χριστοῦ, Ματθαῖον, ἐκδεδωκότα αὐτὸ τοῖς ἀπὸ Ἰουδαϊσμοῦ πιστεύουσαι γράμμασιν ἑβραϊκοῖς συντεταγμένον.

(ε) EUSEBIUS, Hist. Eccl. iii. 24: Ματθαῖος μὲν γὰρ πρότερον Ἑβραίοις κηρύξας, ὥς ἔμελλε καὶ ἐφ' ἑτέροισι ἵναί, πατρίῳ γλώττῃ γραφὴν παραδούς τὸ κατ' αὐτὸν εὐαγγέλιον, τὸ λεῖπον τῇ αὐτοῦ παρουσίᾳ τούτοις ἀφ' ὧν ἐπέλετο διὰ τῆς γραφῆς ἀνεπλήρου. With this may be compared another passage of Eusebius (ad Marin. quæst. ii., p. 941): λέλεκται δὲ ὅψι τοῦ σαββάτου παρὰ τοῦ ἐρμηνεύσαντος τὴν γραφὴν· ὁ μὲν γὰρ εὐαγγελιστῆς Ματθαῖος ἑβραϊδὶ γλώττῃ παρέδωκε τὸ εὐαγγέλιον. This last passage shews that Eusebius himself believed the Gospel to have been written in Hebrew.

(ζ) EPIPHANIUS, Hær. xxix. 9, p. 124, says of the Ebionites and Nazarenes, ἔχουσι δὲ τὸ κατὰ Ματθαῖον εὐαγγέλιον πληρέστατον ἑβραϊστί. παρ' αὐτοῖς γὰρ σαφῶς τοῦτο, καθὼς ἐξ ἀρχῆς ἐγράφη ἑβραϊκοῖς γράμμασιν, ἔτι σώζεται. And again, Hær. xxx. 3, p. 127, καὶ δέχονται μὲν καὶ αὐτοὶ τὸ κατὰ Ματθαῖον εὐαγγέλιον . . . καλοῦσι δὲ αὐτὸ κατὰ Ἑβραίους, ὥς τὰ ἀληθῆ ἐστιν εἰπεῖν, ὅτι Ματθαῖος μόνος ἑβραϊστὶ καὶ ἑβραϊκοῖς γράμμασιν ἐν τῇ καινῇ διαθήκῃ ἐποίησατο τὴν τοῦ εὐαγγελίου ἑκθεσίαν τε καὶ κήρυγμα.

(η) JEROME, Præf. to Matt.: "Matthæus in Judæa Evangelium Hebræo sermone edidit ob eorum vel maxime causam qui in Jesum crediderant ex Judæis." Also de Viris illustr. 3: "Matthæus, qui et Levi, ex publicano Apostolus, primus in Judæa propter eos qui ex circumcisione crediderant, Evangelium Christi Hebraicis literis verbisque composuit, quod quis postea in Græcum transtulerit, non satis certum est. Porro ipsum Hebraicum habetur usque hodie in Cæsariensi bibliotheca, quam Pamphilus martyr studiosissime confecit. Mihi quoque a Nazaræis qui in Beræa urbe Syriæ hoc volumine utuntur, describendi facultas fuit. In quo animadvertendum, quod ubicumque Evangelista, sive ex persona vera sive ex persona Domini Salvatoris, veteris scripturæ testimoniis utitur, non sequatur LXX translatorum auctoritatem, sed Hebraicum, e quibus illa duo sunt: 'Ex Ægypto vocavi filium meum:' et, 'Quoniam Nazaræus vocabitur.'” Also, in quatuor evv. ad Damasum præfatio: De novo nunc loquor testamento, quod Græcum esse non dubium est, excepto Apostolo Matthæo, qui primus in Judæa Evangelium Christi Hebraicis literis edidit. Again, Ep. Damaso de Osanna: Matthæus, qui Evangelium Hebraico sermone conscripsit, ita posuit osanna berama, id est, Osanna in excelsis, &c. Again, Ep. Hedibis, quæst. viii.: In Evangelio autem (Matthæi, from context), quod Hebraicis literis scriptum est, legimus, non velum templi scissum, sed superliminare templi miræ magnitudinis corruisse. Again, Comm. in Hos. xi. in treating of the words ‘Out of Egypt have I called my son,’ he says, “Hunc locum in septimo volumine Julianus Augustus quod adversum nos, i. e., Christianos, evomuit, calumniatur et dicit, quod de Israel scriptum est, Matt. Evangelista ad Christum transtulit, ut simplicitati eorum qui de gentibus crediderant illuderet. Ovi nos breviter respondebimus: 1º, Matthæum Evangelium Hebræis literis edidisse, quod non poterant legere nisi hi qui ex Hebræis erant: ergo non propterea fecit ut illuderet ethnicis.” Jerome refers also to the tradition mentioned under (γ) above, and says, “Reperit (Pantænus) in India Bartholomæum de duodecim Apostolis adventum Domini nostri Jesu Christi juxta Matthæi Evangelium prædicasse, quod, Hebraicis litteris scriptum, revertens Alexandriam secum detulit.” (De Viris illustr. 36.)

(θ) Gregory Nazianzen, Chrysostom, Augustin, Isidorus Hispalensis, Theophylact, Euthymius, and others, assert the same.

B. Those who maintain a GREEK original, rest principally on the internal evidence furnished by the Gospel itself. But they also demur to the sufficiency of the external evidence above cited. They object,

I. (ι) That the testimony of Papias, on which much of this evidence rests, is unsatisfactory, as having proceeded from a man of weak judgment.

(κ) That there appears to have been some confusion between the (supposed) Hebrew original of St. Matthew, and the heretical ‘Gospel according to the Hebrews.’ Jerome, de Viris illustr. 3, says (see above, [7]) that he had seen the Hebrew original of Matthew at Beræa by favour of the Nazarenes, and had copied it. But further, in his Commentary on Matt. ii. he says, In Evangelio quo utuntur Nazaræi et Hebionita, quod nuper in Græcum de Hebræo sermone transtulimus, et quod vocatur a plerisque Matthæi authenticum, &c. And the Commentary on Matt. was written some years after his Treatise de Viris illustr. Again, still later, Dialog. adv. Pelagianos, lib. iii.: In Evangelio juxta Hebræos, quod Chaldaico quidem Syroque sermone, sed Hebraicis literis conscriptum est, quo utuntur usque hodie Nazareni, secundum Apostolos, sive ut plerique autumant, juxta Matthæum, quod et in Cæsariensi habetur bibliotheca, narrat historia (then follows an apocryphal anecdote).

Now let these notices be compared with his assertion above, that the Hebrew original of Matt. related 'superliminare templi miræ magnitudinis corruisse,' and it will appear,

1. That Jerome once believed the Hebrew MS. in the Cæsarean library to be the original Gospel of St. Matthew.

2. That he believed this original to be different from our present Greek Gospel: for he quotes from it things not found there.

3. That in subsequent years he modified his opinion that this document was the original Hebrew text of St. Matthew, and took refuge under 'quod vocatur a plerisque,' and 'secundum Apostolos, sive ut plerique autumant,' &c.

(A) Light is thrown on this uncertainty by the assertion of Epiphanius (above, [L]), which clearly shews that he was misled by the Nazarenes and Ebionites to believe their Gospel to be the genuine Gospel of Matthew.

II. But the advocates of the Greek original rest mainly on the phænomena of the Gospel itself. They maintain,

(μ) That the present Greek text stands on precisely the same footing as that of the other Gospels: is cited as early, and as constantly as they are.

(ν) That the hypothesis of a translation from the Hebrew altogether fails to account for the identity observable in certain parts of the text of the three synoptic Gospels. For the translator must either have been acquainted with the other two Gospels,—in which case it is inconceivable that in the midst of the present coincidences in many passages, such divergences should have occurred,—or unacquainted with them, in which case the identity itself would be altogether inexplicable.

(ξ) A further observation of the coincidences and divergences is said to confirm the view of a Greek original. The synoptic Gospels mainly coincide in the discourses and words of our Lord, but diverge in their narrative portions; and while verbal identity is found principally in the former, the latter present the phænomena either of independent translations from the same original, or of independent histories.

(ο) Again, whereas the Evangelists themselves, in citing the O. T.

usually quote from the Hebrew text, our Lord in his discourses almost uniformly quotes the Septuagint, even where it differs from the Hebrew. This is urged as tending to establish the Greek original of St. Matt. : for if the Gospel were really written in Hebrew for the use of Jews, it is not conceivable that the citations would be given in any but the Hebrew text : and equally inconceivable that the translator would have rendered them into the language of the LXX in our Lord's discourses, while he retained the Hebrew readings in the narrative.

(π) But the same fact would also tend to establish that our Lord *spoke usually in Greek*¹⁹,—that Greek was the language commonly used and generally understood by the Jews of Palestine,—and consequently, that the composition of a Hebrew Gospel for the early Judæo-Christians would be unnecessary, and in the last degree improbable.

C. (ρ) It would exceed the limits of these Prolegomena to argue the question at length. I can only state my own judgment on the point in debate. In the first edition of this work, I acceded to what appeared to me the irresistible weight of testimony of antiquity. But I have since then studied very closely the text itself, especially with reference to its revision in those passages which find parallels in the other Gospels : and I am bound to say that my view of the Hebrew origin is much shaken.

(σ) Besides which, it certainly appears to me, that the testimonies of Epiphanius and Jerome go to shew that they believed the so-called Gospel to the Hebrews TO BE THE VERITABLE ORIGINAL of St. Matthew : that so believing, Jerome copied and translated it, and quoted from it : but subsequently found reason to doubt this, and gradually modified his former assertions. Strange as this may be, I do not see how we can deny it as the result of combining the above extracts from his writings.

(τ) On the whole, then, I find myself constrained to abandon the view maintained in my first edition, and to adopt that of a Greek original.

(υ) We thus have to consider the first Gospel on the same ground, and to judge it by the same rules, as the second and third Gospels.

¹⁹ This has been ingeniously maintained (by the late Duke of Manchester) in 'A Chapter on the Harmonizing Gospels,' printed at the University Press, Dublin, 1854. See also Hug. Einleitung, ed. 4, vol. ii. pp. 27—49, on the ordinary language of Palestine when Matt. wrote his Gospel.

SECTION III.

FOR WHAT READERS AND WITH WHAT OBJECT IT WAS WRITTEN.

1. The statements in several of the testimonies above cited, shew the prevalence of a general opinion that Matthew originally drew up his Gospel for the use of the Jewish converts in Palestine. And internal notices tend to confirm this inference. We have fewer interpretations of Jewish customs, laws, and localities, than in the two other Gospels. The whole narrative proceeds more upon a Jewish view of matters, and is concerned more to establish that point, which to a Jewish convert would be most important,—that Jesus was the Messiah prophesied in the Old Testament. Hence the commencement of his genealogy from Abraham and David; hence the frequent notice of the necessity of this or that event happening, because it was so foretold by the prophets; hence the constant opposition of our Lord's spiritually ethical teaching to the carnal formalistic ethics of the Scribes and Pharisees.

2. But we must not think of the Gospel as a systematic treatise drawn up with this end continually in view. It only exercised a very general and indirect influence over the composition, not excluding narratives, sayings, and remarks which had no such tendency, or even partook of an opposite one.

3. Grecian readers were certainly also in the view of the Apostle; and in consequence, he adds interpretations and explanations, such e. g. as ch. i. 23; xxvii. 8, 33, 46, for their information.

4. In furtherance of the design above mentioned, we may discern (with the caution given in 2) a more frequent and consistent reference to the Lord as a King, and to his Messianic kingdom, than in the other Gospels. Designing these Prolegomena not as a complete Introduction to the Gospels, but merely as subsidiary to the following Commentary, I purposely do not give instances of these characteristics, but leave them to be gathered by the student as he proceeds.

SECTION IV.

AT WHAT TIME IT WAS WRITTEN.

1. The testimony of the early Church is unanimous, that Matthew wrote first among the Evangelists. Clement of Alexandria, who dissented from the present order of our Gospels, yet placed those of Matthew and Luke first: προγεγράφθαι ἔλεγε τῶν εὐαγγελίων τὰ περιέχοντα τὰς γενεαλογίας (Eusebius, Hist. Eccl. vi. 14). Origen's testimony see above (§ ii. 1, δ). And Irenæus (see above, ibid., β) relates that Matthew wrote his Gospel while Peter and Paul were preaching and founding the Church in Rome¹. Without adopting this statement, we may remark that it represents a date, to which internal chronological notices are not repugnant. It seems, from ch. xxvii. 8, and xxviii. 15, that some considerable time had elapsed since the events narrated; while, from the omission of all mention of the destruction of Jerusalem, it would appear that the Gospel was published before that event. All these marks of time are, however, exceedingly vague, especially when other notices are taken into account, which place the Gospel eight years after the Ascension (Theophyl. and Euthym.); —fifteen years after the ascension (Niceph. Hist. Eccl. ii. 45):—at the time of the stoning of Stephen (Cosmas Indicopleustes. Fabricius, Bibl. Gr. iv. 5).

SECTION V.

ITS STYLE AND CHARACTER.

1. The Gospel of Matthew is written in the same form of diction which pervades the other Gospels, the Hebraistic or Hellenistic Greek. This dialect resulted from the dispersion of the Greek language by the conquests of Alexander, and more especially from the intercourse of Jews with Greeks in the city of Alexandria. It is that of the LXX version of the Old Testament; of the apocryphal books; and of the writings of Philo and Josephus. In these two latter, however, it is not so marked, as in versions from the Hebrew, or books aiming at a Hebraistic character.

2. Of the three Gospels, that of Matthew presents the most complete example of the Hebraistic diction and construction, with perhaps the exception of the first chapter of Luke. And from what has been above said respecting its design, this would naturally be the case.

3. The internal character of this Gospel also answers to what we know of the history and time of its compilation. Its marks of chronological sequence are very vague, and many of them are hardly perhaps to be insisted on at all. When compared with the more definite notices of Mark and Luke, its order of events is sometimes superseded by theirs. It was to be expected, in the earliest written accounts of matters so important, that the object should rather be to record the things done, and the sayings of our Lord, than the precise order in which they took place.

4. It is in this principal duty of an Evangelist that Matthew stands pre-eminent; and especially in the report of the longer discourses of our Lord. It was within the limits of his purpose in writing, to include all the descriptions of the state and hopes of the citizens of the kingdom of heaven which Jesus gave during His ministry. This seems to have been the peculiar gift of the Spirit to him,—to recall and deliver down, in their strictest verbal connexion, such discourses as the Sermon on the Mount, ch. v.—vii.; the apostolic commission, ch. x.; the discourse concerning John, ch. xi.; that on blasphemy against the Holy Ghost, ch. xii.; the series of parables, ch. xiii.; that to the Apostles on their divisions, ch. xviii.; and in their fulness, the whole series of polemical discourses and prophetic parables in ch. xxi.—xxv.

5. It has been my endeavour in the following Commentary, to point out the close internal connexion of the longer discourses, and to combat the mistake of those critics, who suppose them to be no more than collections of shorter sayings associated together from similarity of subject or character.

6. On the connexion between the Epistle of James and some parts of this Gospel, see the Prolegomena to that Epistle, Vol. IV.

CHAPTER III.

OF THE GOSPEL ACCORDING TO MARK.

SECTION I.

ITS AUTHORSHIP.

1. As in the case of the two other Gospels, we are dependent entirely on traditional sources for the name of the author. It has been universally believed to be Marcus: and further, that he was the same person who in Acts xii. 12, 25; xv. 37, is spoken of as Ἰωάννης ὁ ἐπικαλούμενος (ἐπικληθείς, καλούμενος) Μάρκος: in xiii. 5, 13, as Ἰωάννης: in xv. 39, as Μάρκος: also in Col. iv. 10: 2 Tim. iv. 11: Philem. 24. The few particulars gleaned respecting him from Scripture are, that his mother's name was Mary (Acts xii. 12); and that she was sister to the Apostle Barnabas (Col. iv. 10); that she dwelt in Jerusalem (Acts, ibid.); that he was converted to Christianity by the Apostle Peter (1 Pet. v. 13); that he became the minister and companion of Paul and Barnabas, in their first missionary journey (Acts xii. 25); and was the cause of the variance and separation of these Apostles on their second (Acts xv. 37—40),—Barnabas wishing to take him again with them, but Paul refusing, because he had departed from them before the completion of the former journey (Acts xiii. 13). He then became the companion of Barnabas in his journey to Cyprus (Acts xv. 39). We find him however again with Paul (Col. iv. 10), and an allusion apparently made in the words there to some previous stain on his character, which was then removed; see also Philem. 24: 2 Tim. iv. 11. Lastly, we find him with Peter (1 Pet. v. 13). From Scripture we know no more concerning him. But an unanimous tradition of the ancient Christian writers represents him as the ‘interpretes’ of Peter: i. e. the secretary or amanuensis, whose office it was to commit to writing the orally-delivered instructions and narrations of the Apostle. See authorities quoted in § ii., below.

2. Tradition (Eusebius, Hist. Eccl. ii. 15) brings him with Peter to Rome (but apparently only on the authority of 1 Pet. v. 13); and thence to Alexandria. He is said to have become first bishop of the Church in that city, and to have suffered martyrdom there. All this however is exceedingly uncertain.

SECTION II.

ITS ORIGIN.

1. It was universally believed in the ancient Church, that Mark’s Gospel was written under the influence, and almost by the dictation, of Peter.

(a) Eusebius quotes from Papias (Hist. Eccl. iii. 39), as a testimony of John the presbyter, Μάρκος μὲν ἑρμηνευτὴς Πέτρον γενόμενος, ὅσα ἐμνημόνευσεν, ἀκριβῶς ἔγραψεν, κ.τ.λ.

(β) The same author (Hist. Eccl. v. 8) says, Μάρκος ὁ μαθητὴς καὶ ἑρμηνευτὴς Πέτρον, καὶ αὐτὸς τὰ ὑπὸ Πέτρον κηρυσσόμενα ἐγγράφως ἡμῖν παραδέδωκε. This he quotes from Irenæus (iii. 1, p. 174); and further that this took place μετὰ τὴν τούτων (i. e. τοῦ Πέτρον κ. τοῦ Παύλου) ἐξόδον.

(γ) The same author (Hist. Eccl. ii. 15) relates on the authority of Clement (Hypotyp. vi.) and Papias, that the hearers of Peter at Rome, unwilling that his teaching should be lost to them, besought Mark, who was a follower of Peter, to commit to writing the substance of that teaching; that the Apostle, being informed supernaturally of the work in which Mark was engaged, ἡσθῆναι τῇ τῶν ἀνδρῶν προθυμίᾳ, κυρῶσαι τὴν γραφὴν εἰς ἑντευξίν τῆς ἐκκλησίας. This account is manifestly inconsistent with the former.

(δ) In Hist. Eccl. vi. 14, Eusebius gives yet another account, citing the very passage of Clement above referred to: that Peter, knowing of Mark's work when it was completed and published, προρηπτικῶς μήτε κωλύσαι μήτε προτρέψασθαι.

(ε) The same author, in his Demonstr. Evang. iii. 5, p. 122, says, Πέτρος δὲ ταῦτα περὶ ἑαυτοῦ μαρτυρεῖ· πάντα γὰρ τὰ παρὰ Μάρκῳ τοῦ Πέτρου διαλέξεων εἶναι λέγεσθαι ἀπομνημονεύματα.

2. The above testimonies must now be examined as to how far we are bound to receive them as decisive. We may observe that the matter to which they refer is one which could, from its nature, have been known to very few persons; viz. the private and unavowed influence of an Apostle over the writer. (For I reject at oncé the account which makes Peter authorize the Gospel, from no such authorization being apparent, which it certainly would have been, had it ever existed.) Again, the accounts cited are most vague and inconsistent as to the extent and nature of this influence,—some stating it to have been no more than that Peter preached, and Mark, after his death, collected the substance of his testimony from memory; others making it extend even to the dictation of the words by the Apostle.

3. It is obvious that all such accounts must be judged according to the phenomena presented by the Gospel itself. Now we find, in the title of the Gospel, a presumption that no such testimony of Peter is here presented to us, as we have of Matthew in the former Gospel. Had such been the case, we should have found it called the Gospel according to Peter, not according to Mark.

4. If again we examine the contents of the Gospel, we are certainly not justified in concluding that Peter's hand has been directly employed in its compilation in its present form. The various mentions, and omissions of mention, of incidents in which that Apostle is directly concerned, are such as to be in no way consistently accounted for on this hypothesis. For let it be allowed that a natural modesty might have occasionally led him to omit matters tending to his honour,—yet how are we to account for his omitting to give an exact detail of other things at which he was present, and of which he might have rendered the most precise and circumstantial account? This has been especially the case in the narrative of the day of the Resurrection, not to mention numerous other instances which will be noticed in the Commentary. Besides, the above hypothesis regarding his suppressions cannot be consistently carried out. A remarkable instance to the contrary may be seen ch. xvi. 7, where εἰπὼς τοῖς μαθηταῖς αὐτοῦ καὶ τῷ Πέτρῳ stands for εἰπὼς τοῖς μαθηταῖς αὐτοῦ in Matthew.

5. We are led to the same conclusion by a careful comparison of the contents of this Gospel with those of Matthew and Luke. We find that it follows the same great cycle of apostolic teaching;—that its narratives are derived in many cases from the same sources;—that it is improbable that any individual Apostle should have moulded and fashioned a record which keeps so much to the beaten track of the generally-received Evangelic history. His own individual remembrances must unavoidably have introduced additions of so considerable an amount as to have given to the Gospel more original matter than it at present possesses.

6. But while unable to conceive any influence directly exerted by Peter over the compilation of the Gospel, I would by no means deny the possibility of the derivation of some narratives in it from that Apostle, and recognize in such derivation the ground of the above testimonies. The peculiarly minute and graphic precision (presently, § viii. to be further spoken of) which distinguishes this Evangelist, seems to claim for him access in many cases to the testimony of some eye-witness where the other two Evangelists have not had that advantage. I have pointed out these cases where they occur, in the Commentary; and have not hesitated in some of them to refer conjecturally to Peter as the source of the narration.

7. The inference to be drawn from what has preceded is, that,—the general tradition of the ancients which ascribed to Mark a connexion with Peter as his secretary or interpreter, being adopted, as likely to be founded on fact,—yet the idea of any considerable or direct influence of Peter over the writing of the Gospel is not borne out by the work itself. We may so far recognize in it one form of the probable truth;—it is likely that Mark, from continual intercourse with and listening to Peter, and possibly from preservation of many of his narrations entire, may have been able, after his death, or at all events when separated from him, to preserve in his Gospel those vivid and original touches of description and filling-out of the incidents, which we now discover in it. Further than this I do not think we are authorized in assuming; and even this is conjectural only.

FOR WHAT READERS AND WITH WHAT OBJECT IT WAS WRITTEN.

1. Internal evidence is very full as to the class of readers for whom Mark compiled his Gospel: the Gentile Christians are clearly pointed out by the following indications:—

- (α) The omission of all genealogical notices of our Lord's descent.
- (β) The general abstinence from Old Testament citations, except in reporting discourses of our Lord (ch. i. 2, 3 is the only exception, xv. 28 being rejected as spurious).
- (γ) The appending of interpretations to the Hebrew or Aramaic terms occurring in the narrative (ch. v. 41; vii. 11, 34).
- (δ) The explanations of Jewish customs, as for example ch. vii. 3, 4.
- (ε) Remarkable insertions or omissions in particular places: as, e. g. παῖν τοῖς ἔθνεσιν, ch. xi. 17, which words are omitted in Matthew and Luke:—no mention of the Jewish law:—omission of the limitations of the mission of the Apostles in Matt. x. (common however also to Luke.)

2. It is true that too much stress must not be laid on single particulars of this sort, as indicating design, where the sources of the Gospels were so scattered and fragmentary. But the concurrence of all these affords a very strong presumption that that class of readers was in the view of the Evangelist, in whose favour all these circumstances unite. See Prolegomena to Matthew, § iii. 2.

SECTION IV.

AT WHAT TIME IT WAS WRITTEN.

1. The most direct testimony on this head is that of Irenæus, iii. 1 (see above, § ii. 1, β), that it was after the deaths of Peter and Paul. This would place its date, at all events, after the year 63 (see Prolegg. to Acts, chronological table). But here, as in the case of the other Gospels, very little can be with any certainty inferred. We have conflicting traditions (see above, § ii.), and the Gospel itself affords us no clue whatever.

2. One thing only we may gather from the contents of the three first Gospels,—that none of them could have been originally written after the destruction of Jerusalem. Had they been, the omission of all allusion to so signal a fulfilment of our Lord's prophecies would be inexplicable. In the case indeed of Luke, we can approximate nearer than this (see below, ch. iv. § iv.); but in those of Matthew and Mark, this is all which can be safely assumed as to the time of their first publication;—that it was after the dispersion or even the death of most of the Apostles, and before the investment of Jerusalem by the Roman armies under Titus in the year 70.

SECTION V.

AT WHAT PLACE IT WAS WRITTEN.

Of this we have no trustworthy evidence. Most ancient writers (Clement, Eusebius, Jerome, Epiphanius, &c.) mention Rome; but apparently in connexion with the idea of Mark having written under the superintendence of Peter. Chrysostom mentions Alexandria; but no Alexandrine writer confirms the statement. In modern times, Storr has advanced a hypothesis that Mark wrote at Antioch, which he grounds, but insufficiently, on a comparison of ch. xv. 21, with Acts xi. 20.

SECTION VI.

IN WHAT LANGUAGE IT WAS WRITTEN.

1. There has never been any reasonable doubt that Mark wrote in Greek. The two Syriac versions contain a marginal note, that Mark preached in Rome in Latin: and four mss. enumerated by Scholz, Prolegg. p. xxx, append a notice, τὸ κατ. μάρκ. εὐαγ. ἐγράφη ρωμαϊστὶ ἐν Ῥώμῃ μετὰ ἔτη ὑπὸ τῆς ἀναλήψεως τοῦ κυρίου. This statement, however, is destitute of probability from any external or internal evidence, and is only one more assumption from the hypothetical publication in Rome under the superintendence of Peter, and for Roman converts.

2. Many writers of the Romish Church have defended the hypothesis of a Latin original, being biassed by a wish to maintain the authority of the Vulgate: and a pretended part of the original autograph of the Evangelist is still shewn in the Library of St. Mark's church at Venice; which, however, has been detected to be merely part of an ancient Latin MS. of the four Gospels,—another fragment of which exists, or existed, at Prague,—formerly preserved at Aquileia.

3. If Mark wrote in Latin, it is almost inconceivable that the original should have perished so early that no ancient writer should have made mention of the fact. For Latin was the language of a considerable and increasing body of Christians,—unlike Hebrew, which was little known, and belonged to a section of converts few in number:—yet ancient testimony is unanimous to Matthew's having written in Hebrew,—while we have not one witness to Mark having written in Latin.

SECTION VII.

GENUINENESS OF THE GOSPEL.

1. This has never been called in question, till very recently, by some of the German critics (Schleiermacher, Credner:—which last however [see Meyer, Com. ii. 9, note] has since seen reason to abandon his view,—and more recently still, Grimm) on, as it appears to me, wholly insufficient grounds. They allege that the testimony of Papias (see above, § ii. 1, a) does not apply to the contents of our present Gospel, but that some later hand has worked up and embellished the original simple and unarranged notices of Mark, which have perished.

2. But neither do the words of Papias imply any such inference as that Mark's notices must have been simple and unarranged; nor, if they did, are they of any considerable authority in the matter. It is enough that from the very earliest time the Gospel has been known as that of Mark; confirmed as this evidence is by the circumstance, that this name belongs to no great and distinguished founder of the Church, to whom it might naturally be ascribed, but to one, the ascription to whom can hardly be accounted for, except by its foundation in matter of fact.

3. On the genuineness of the remarkable fragment at the end of the Gospel, see notes there.

SECTION VIII.

ITS STYLE AND CHARACTER.

1. Of the three first Gospels, that of Mark is the most distinct and peculiar in style. By far the greater part of those graphic touches which describe the look and gesture of our Lord, the arrangement or appearance of those around Him, the feelings with which He contemplated the persons whom He addressed, are contained in this Gospel. While the matters related are fewer than in either Matthew or Luke, Mark, in by far the greater number of common narrations, is the most copious, and rich in lively and interesting detail.

2. In one part only does Mark appear as an abridger of previously well-known facts; viz. in ch. i. 1—13, where,—his object being to detail the official life of our Lord,—he hastens through the previous great events,—the ministry of John, the baptism and temptation of Christ. But even in the abrupt transitions of this section, there is wonderful graphic power, presenting us with a series of life-like pictures, calculated to impress the reader strongly with the reality, and dignity, of the events related.

3. Throughout the Gospel, even where the narratives are the most copious, the same isolated character of each, the same abrupt transition from one to another, is observable. There is no attempt to bind on one section to another, or to give any sequences of events. But occasionally the very precision of the separate narratives of itself furnishes accurate and valuable chronological data:—e. g. the important one in ch. iv. 35, by which it becomes evident that the whole former part of Matthew's Gospel is out of chronological order.

4. Mark relates but few discourses. His object being to set forth Jesus as the SON OF GOD (see ch. i. 1), he principally dwells on the events of His official life. But the same characteristics mark his report of our Lord's discourses, where he relates them, as we have observed in the rest of his narrative. While the sequence and connexion of the longer discourses was that which the Holy Spirit peculiarly brought to the mind of Matthew, the Apostle from whom Mark's record is derived seems to have been deeply penetrated and impressed by the solemn iterations of cadence and expression, and to have borne away the very words themselves and tone of the Lord's sayings. See especially, as illustrating this, the wonderfully sublime reply, ch. ix. 39—50.

5. According to the view adopted and vindicated in the notes on ch. xvi. 9—20, the Gospel terminates abruptly with the words ἑποβούνητο γάρ, ver. 8. That this was not intentionally done, but was a defect,—is apparent, by the addition, in apostolic times, of the authentic and most important fragment which now concludes the narrative.

6. I regard the existence of the Gospel of Mark as a gracious and valuable proof of the accommodation by the divine Spirit of the records of the life of our Lord to the future necessities of the Church. While it contains little matter of fact which is not related in Matthew and Luke, and thus, generally speaking, forms only a confirmation of their more complete histories, it is so far from being a barren duplicate of that part of them which is contained in it, that it comes home to every reader with all the freshness of an individual mind, full of the Holy Ghost, intently fixed on the great object of the Christian's love and worship, reverently and affectionately following and recording His positions, and looks, and gestures, and giving us the very echo of the tones with which He spoke. And thus the believing student feels, while treating of and studying this Gospel, as indeed he does of each in its turn, that,—without venturing to compare with one another in value these rich and abiding gifts of the Holy Spirit to the Church,—the Gospel of Mark is at least as precious to him as any of the others; serving an end, and filling a void, which could not without spiritual detriment be left uncared for.

CHAPTER IV.

ON THE GOSPEL ACCORDING TO LUKE.

SECTION I.

ITS AUTHORSHIP.

1. ALTHOUGH the Author of this Gospel plainly enough speaks of himself in his Introduction, and in that to the Acts of the Apostles, we are left to gather his name from tradition. Here, however, as in the case of Mark, there seems to be no reasonable ground of doubt. It has been universally ascribed to Lucas, or Luke, spoken of Col. iv. 14, and again Philem. 24, and 2 Tim. iv. 11.

2. Of this person we know no more with any certainty than we find related in the Acts of the Apostles and the passages above referred to. From Col. iv. 11, 14, it would appear that he was not born a Jew, being there distinguished from οἱ ὄντες ἐκ περιτομῆς. It is, however, quite uncertain whether he had become a Jewish proselyte previous to his conversion to Christianity. His worldly calling was that of a Physician; he is called ὁ ἰατρός ὁ ἀγαπητός by Paul, Col. iv. 14. A very late tradition (Niceph. Hist. Eccl. ii. 43), generally adopted by the Romish Church, makes him also to have been a painter; but it is in no respect deserving of credit. His birthplace is said by Eusebius (Hist. Eccl. iii. 4) and Jerome (Script. Eccles. under Lucas) to have been Antioch, but traditionally only, and perhaps from a mistaken identification of him with Lucius, Acts xiii. 1 (Lucas = Lucanus, not Lucius). Tradition, as delivered by Epiphanius (Hær. li. 11, p. 433, Pseudo-Origen, Theophylact, Euthymius, &c., makes him to have been one of the seventy, Luke x. 1; but this is refuted by his own testimony, in his Preface,—where he by implication distinguishes himself from those who were eye-witnesses and ministers of the word. It seems to have arisen from his Gospel alone containing the account of their mission.

3. Luke appears to have attached himself to Paul during the second missionary journey of the Apostle, and at Troas (Acts xvi. 10). This may be inferred from his there first making use of the first person plural in his narrative; after saying (ver. 8) κατέβησαν εἰς Τρωάδα, he proceeds (ver. 10), εὐθὺς ἐζητήσαμεν ἐξελθεῖν εἰς τὴν Μακεδονίαν. He thence accompanied Paul to Macedonia, remaining perhaps at Philippi (but see below, § iv. 3) until Paul returned thither again at the end of his second visit to Greece, after the disturbance at Ephesus. Thence (Acts xx. 5) we find him again accompanying Paul to Asia and Jerusalem

(xxi. 17) ; being apparently with him at Cæsarea during his imprisonment (xxiv. 23) ; and travelling with him to Rome (xxvii. 1—xxviii. 16). There we also find him remaining with the Apostle to a late period, very nearly till his martyrdom. (See 2 Tim. iv. 11.)

4. Of the time and manner of his death nothing certain is known, and the traditions are inconsistent with one another: some, as Greg. Naz., alleging him to have suffered martyrdom, while the general report is that he died a natural death.

SECTION II.

ITS ORIGIN.

1. A plain statement of the origin of this Gospel is given us by the Author himself, in his preface, ch. i. 1—4. He there states that many had taken in hand to draw up a statement, according to the testimony of those who were from the beginning eye-witnesses and ministers of the word, of the matters received (or fulfilled) among Christians ; and that it therefore seemed good to him also, having carefully traced the progress of events from the first, to write an arranged account of the same to his friend (or patron) Theophilus.

2. From this we gather, (1) that Luke was not himself an eye-witness, nor a minister of the word (ὑπηρέτης τοῦ λόγου) from the beginning ; (2) that he compiled his Gospel from the testimony of eye-witnesses and Apostles, which he carefully collected and arranged. For (1) he implicitly excludes himself from the number of the αὐτόπται κ. ὑπ. τ. λόγον and (2) by the καὶ ἐγώ he includes himself among the πολλοί, who made use of autoptic and apostolic testimony.

3. I have before proved generally that the Gospels of Matthew and Mark cannot have been among the number of these διηγήσεις of which Luke speaks. I may now add to those proofs, that if Luke had seen and received, as of apostolic authority, either or both of these gospels, then his variations from them are, on his own shewing, unaccountable ; if he had seen them, and did not receive them, his coincidences with them are equally unaccountable. The improbabilities and absurdities involved in his having either or both of them before him and working up their narratives into his own, I have before dealt with, in the general Prolegomena to the three Gospels.

4. Judging entirely from the phænomena presented by the Gospel itself, my conclusion with regard to its sources is the following:—that Luke, under the guidance of the Holy Spirit, drew up his Gospel independently of, and without knowledge of, those of Matthew and Mark ; —that he fell in with, in the main, the same cycle of apostolic teaching as the writers of those Gospels placed on record, viz. that which embraced principally the Galilean life and ministry of our Lord, to the exclusion of that part of it which passed at Jerusalem before the formal call of the twelve Apostles;—but that he possessed other sources of information, not open to the compiler of Matthew's Gospel, nor to Mark.

5. To this latter circumstance may be attributed his access to (I believe, from its peculiar style and character) a documentary record of the events preceding and accompanying the birth of the Lord, derived probably from her who alone was competent to narrate several particulars contained in it:—his preservation of the precious and most important cycle of our Lord's discourses and parables contained in that large section of his Gospel, ch. ix. 51—xviii. 15, which is mostly peculiar to himself:—numerous other details scattered up and down in every part of his narrative, shewing autoptic information:—and, lastly, his enlarged account of some events following the Resurrection, and the narration, by him alone, of the circumstances accompanying the Ascension.

6. A tradition was very early current, that Luke's Gospel contained the substance of the teaching of Paul. Irenæus, Hæc. iii. 1, p. 174, states: Λουκᾶς δὲ ὁ ἀκόλουθος Παύλου τὸ ὑπ' ἐκείνου κηρυσσόμενον εὐαγγέλιον ἐν βιβλίῳ κατέθετο². See also Tertullian, cont. Marc. iv. 5, p. 367. But this is contradicted by the implicit assertion of the Evangelist himself in his preface, that the Gospel was compiled and arranged by himself from the testimony of those who ἀπ' ἀρχῆς, 'from the beginning of our Lord's ministry,' were eye-witnesses or ministers of the word³. Among these it is not, of course, possible to reckon Paul.

7. It is however an interesting enquiry, how far his continued intercourse with the great Apostle of the Gentiles may have influenced his diction, or even his selection of facts. It is a remarkable coincidence, that the account of the institution of the Lord's Supper should be nearly verbatim the same⁴ in Luke xxii. 19, and in 1 Cor. xi. 23,—and that Paul claims to have received this last *from the Lord*⁵. For we know, ² Origen, Eusebius, and Jerome go so far as to understand the expression τὸ εὐαγγέλιόν μου, Rom. ii. 16, of the Gospel of Luke. But this is contrary to the usage of the word εὐαγγέλιον in the N. T.: see notes there.

³ The Edinburgh Reviewer denies this. But it is implied by the ἡμῖν and ἰδοὺς καὶ μοί. Had Paul been the source of his information, he would surely have expressed himself otherwise in his preface, and not have so plainly classed himself among those who were dependent for their information on the αὐτόπται and ὑπηρέται τοῦ λόγου.

⁴ Even after conforming the texts to the best MSS. Cf. the two passages.

⁵ It is impossible, with the Edinburgh Reviewer, to regard ἀπὸ τοῦ κυρίου here as spurious. The variations are otherwise accounted for: παρά, by περίλαβον preceding; —θεοῦ, by the invariable practice of noting in the margin, where ὁ κύριος occurs,—θεός, that to compensate to Paul in his apostolic office for the want of autoptic authority, and to constitute him a witness to the truth of the Gospel, a revelation was made to him,—to which he refers, Gal. i. 12: Eph. iii. 3: 1 Cor. xi. 23; xv. 3,—embracing at least the leading facts of the evangelic history. And this circumstance may have acted imperceptibly on the mind of Luke, and even shaped or filled out some of his narratives, in aid of direct historic sources of testimony.

8. There is very little trace of Paul's peculiar diction, or prominence given to the points which it became his especial work to inculcate in the Gospel of Luke. Doubtless we may trace a similar cast of mind and feeling in some instances; as e. g. Luke's carefulness to record the sayings of our Lord which were assertive of His unrestricted love for Jew and Gentile alike: Luke iv. 25 ff.; ix. 52 ff.; x. 30 ff.; xvii. 16, 18. We may observe too that in Luke those parables and sayings are principally found, which most directly regard the great doctrine of man's free justification by grace through faith: e. g. ch. xv. 11 ff.; xvii. 10; xviii. 14, in which latter place the use of δικαιωμένος (see note there) is remarkable. These instances, however, are but few,—and it may perhaps be doubted whether Commentators in general have not laid too great stress upon them. It would be very easy to trace similar relations and analogies in the other Gospels, if we were bent upon doing so.

SECTION III.

FOR WHAT READERS AND WITH WHAT OBJECT IT WAS WRITTEN.

1. Both these questions are formally answered for us by the Evangelist himself. He states, ch. i. 3, that he wrote primarily for the benefit of one Theophilus, and that he might know the certainty of those accounts which had formed the subject of his catechetical instruction.

2. But we can hardly suppose this object to have been the only moving cause to the great work which Luke was undertaking. The probabilities of the case, and the practice of authors in inscribing their works to particular persons, combine to persuade us that Luke must have regarded his friend as the representative of a class of readers for whom his Gospel was designed. And in enquiring what that class was, we must deal with the data furnished by the Gospel itself.

3. In it we find universality the predominant character. There is no or χρηρὸς, by way of explanation. And if it be genuine, then Paul did certainly receive matters of fact by special revelation. The idea of the facts of the Gospel history having been 'familiar to Paul when he was a persecutor' is too absurd to require refutation, as will at once appear from applying it to such a fact as this very one, viz. the institution of the Lord's Supper.

marked regard paid to Jewish readers, as in Matthew, nor to Gentiles, as in Mark; if there be any preference, it seems rather on the side of the latter. In conformity with Jewish practice, we have a genealogy of our Lord, which however does not, as in Matthew, stop with Abraham, but traces up his descent even to the progenitor of the human race. Commentators have noticed that Luke principally records those sayings and acts of our Lord by which God's mercy to the Gentiles is set forth: see ch. xv. 11 ff.; xviii. 10; xix. 5 (but see notes there); x. 33; xvii. 19; ix. 52—56; iv. 25—27. Such instances, however, are not much to be relied on;—see above, ch. i. § ii. 6;—to which I will add, that it would be easy to construct a similar list to prove the same point with respect to Matthew or John⁶;—and I therefore much prefer assigning the above character of universality to this Gospel, which certainly is visible throughout it. That it was constructed for Gentile readers as well as for Jews, is plain; and is further confirmed from the fact of its author having been the friend and companion of the great Apostle of the Gentiles.

4. I infer then that the Gospel was designed for the general use of Christians, whether Jews or Gentiles; and subordinately to this general purpose, for those readers whose acquaintance with Jewish customs and places was sufficient to enable them to dispense with those elucidations of them which Mark and John have given, but which are not found in Matthew or Luke.

5. The object of the Gospel has been sufficiently declared in Luke's own words above cited,—that the converts might know the certainty of those things in which they had received oral instruction as catechumens; in other words, that the portions of our Lord's life and discourses thus imparted to them might receive both permanence, by being committed to writing,—and completion, by being incorporated in a detailed narrative of His acts and sayings.

⁶ e. g. Matthew relates the visit of the Magi, ch. ii. 1 ff.; refers to Galilee of the Gentiles seeing a great light, ch. iv. 15, 16:—'Many shall come from the East and West,' &c. ch. viii. 11.—'Come unto Me all ye that labour,' ch. xi. 28: the Syrophœnician woman (not related by Luke), ch. xv. 21 ff.: 'The Kingdom of God shall be taken from you, and given to a nation,' &c. ch. xxi. 43 (omitted by Luke): 'The elect from the four winds of heaven' (not in Luke), ch. xxiv. 31: 'The judgment of πάντα τὰ ἔθνη,' ch. xxv. 31—46: 'Make disciples of πάντα τὰ ἔθνη,' ch. xxviii. 19.—Again, John relates the visit to the Samaritans, ch. iv.; 'The other sheep not of this fold,' ch. x. 16: 'not for that nation only, but that he should gather together in one the children of God that were scattered abroad,' ch. xi. 52: 'The request of the Greeks at the feast,' ch. xii. 20, &c. &c. See the view, that Luke wrote for Greeks principally, ingeniously illustrated in the lecture prefixed to this Gospel in the first volume of Dr. Wordsworth's Greek Testament: which however, like the other notices of this learned writer, is written far too strongly in the spirit of an advocate, who can see only that which it is his aim to prove.

SECTION IV.

AT WHAT TIME IT WAS WRITTEN.

1. We are enabled to approximate to the time of the publication of this Gospel with much more certainty than we can to that of any of the others. The enquiry may be thus conducted.—We may safely assume that the 'former treatise' of Acts i. 1, can be no other than this Gospel. And on that follows the inference, that the Gospel was published before the Acts of the Apostles. Now the last event recorded in the Acts is an interview of Paul with the Jews, shortly after his arrival in Rome. We further have the publication of the Acts, by the words of ch. xxviii. 30, postponed two whole years after that arrival and interview; but, I believe, no longer than that. For had Paul continued longer than that time in his hired house before the publication, it must have been so stated; and had he left Rome or that house, or had any remarkable event happened to him before the publication, we cannot suppose that so careful a recorder as Luke would have failed to bring his work down to the time then present, by noticing such departure or such event. I assume then the publication of the Acts to have taken place two years after Paul's arrival at Rome: i. e. according to Wieseler (Chron. des Apostolischen Zeitalters, pp. 117, 118: see chronological table in Prolegg. to Acts, Vol. II.), in the spring of A.D. 63.

2. We have therefore a fixed date, before which the Gospel must have been published. But if I am not mistaken, we have, by internal evidence, the date of its publication removed some time back from this date. It is hardly probable that Luke would speak of, as ὁ πρῶτος λόγος, a work in which he was then, or had been very lately, engaged. But not to dwell on this,—even allowing that the prefatory and dedicatory matter, as is usually the case, may have come last from the hands of the author,—I find in the account of the Ascension, which immediately follows, a much more cogent proof, that the Gospel had been some considerable time published. For while it recapitulates the Gospel account just so much that we can trace the same hand in it (compare Acts i. 4 with Luke xxiv. 49), it is manifestly a different account, much fuller in particulars, and certainly unknown to the Evangelist when he wrote his Gospel. Now, as we may conclude, in accordance with the παρηκολουθησάντι πᾶσιν ἀκριβῶς, of Luke i. 3, that he would have carefully sought out every available source of information at the time of writing his Gospel,—this becoming acquainted with a new account of the Ascension implies that in the mean time fresh sources of information had been opened to him. And this would most naturally be by change of place, seeing that various fixed cycles of apostolic teaching were likely to be current in, and about, the respective mother churches. Now the changes of place in Luke's recent history had been,—two years before, from Cæsarea to Rome, Acts xxvii. 1 ff.; two years and a half before that, from Philippi to Jerusalem, Acts xx. 6; xxi. 15 ff.,—and Cæsarea. This last is left to be inferred from his leaving Cæsarea with Paul, ch. xxvii. 1;—at all events he was during this time in Palestine, with, or near Paul. I shall make it probable in the Prolegomena to Vol. II. that during this period he was engaged in collecting materials for and compiling the Acts of the Apostles; and by consequence (see above), that in all probability the Gospel had been then written and published. This would place its publication before A.D. 58;—consequently, before the traditional date of the Gospel of Matthew,—see above, ch. ii. § iv.

3. Tracing Luke's history further back than this,—it has been thought that he remained at Philippi during the whole time comprised between Acts xvii. 1 and xx. 6, because he disuses the first person at the first of those dates, at Philippi,—and resumes it also at Philippi, at the second. Now this was a period of seven years: far too long for such an inference as the above to be made with any probability. During this time he may have travelled into Palestine, and collected the information which he incorporated in his Gospel. For that it was collected in Palestine, is on all accounts probable. And that it should have been published much before this is, I think, improbable.

4. My reasons are the following:—I have implied in the former part of these Prolegomena, that it is not likely that the present evangelic collections would be made, until the dispersion of all or most of the Apostles on their missionary journeys. Besides this, the fact of numerous διηγήσεις having been already drawn up after the model of the apostolic narrative teaching, forbids us to suppose their teaching by oral communication to have been in its fulness still available. Now the Apostles, or the greater part of them, were certainly at Jerusalem at the time of the council in Acts xv. 1—5 ff., i. e. about A.D. 50. How soon after that time their dispersion took place, it is quite impossible to determine:—but we have certainly this date as our terminus a quo, before which, as I believe, no Gospel could have been published.

5. After this dispersion of the Apostles, it will be necessary to allow some time to elapse for the διηγήσεις of which Luke speaks (ch. i. 1) to be drawn up;—not less certainly than one or two years, or more; which would bring us just about to the time when he was left behind by Paul in Philippi. This last arrangement must however be, from its merely hypothetical grounds, very uncertain.

6. At all events, we have thus eight years, A.D. 50—58, as the limits within which it is probable that the Gospel was published. And, without pretending to minute accuracy in these two limits, we may at least set it down as likely that the publication did not take place much before Luke and Paul are found together, nor after the last journey which Paul made to Jerusalem, A.D. 58. And even if the grounds on which this latter is concluded be objected to, we have, as a final resort, the fixed date of the publication of the Acts two years after Paul's arrival at Rome, after which, by internal evidence, the Gospel cannot have been published.

SECTION V.

AT WHAT PLACE IT WAS WRITTEN.

1. Our answer to this enquiry will of course depend upon the considerations discussed in the last section. Adopting the view there taken, we find Luke in Asia Minor, Syria, or Palestine (probably) previously to his first journey with Paul A.D. 51; and from that time till his second journey A.D. 58, perhaps remaining in Greece, but perhaps also travelling for the sake of collecting information for his Gospel. At all events, at the latter part of this period he is again found at Philippi. We need not then dissent from the early tradition reported by Jerome (Prolog. in Matt.), that Luke published his Gospel 'in Achaia^s Bœotia^æque partibus,' as being on the whole the most likely inference.

2. The inscription in the Syriac version,—and Simeon Metaphrastes in the tenth century,—report that the Gospel was written at Alexandria, but apparently without any authority.

SECTION VI.

IN WHAT LANGUAGE IT WAS WRITTEN.

There never has been any doubt that Luke wrote his Gospel in Greek. His familiarity with Greek terms and idioms, and above all, the classical style of his preface, are of themselves convincing internal evidence that it was so⁷.

SECTION VII.

GENUINENESS OF THE GOSPEL.

1. It has been generally and almost unanimously acknowledged that the Gospel which we now possess is that written and published by Luke.

2. Whatever doubts may have been raised by rationalistic Commentators as to the genuineness of the two first chapters, have been adopted in aid of their attempts to overthrow their authenticity (on which see the next section); and have rested on no sufficient ground of themselves. Their principal appeal is to Marcion, who notoriously mutilated the Gospel, to make it favour his views of the Person of Christ.

⁷ See the lecture above referred to, prefixed to St. Luke in Wordsworth's G. Test. vol. i.

3. On the genuineness of ch. xxii. 43, 44, see various readings and notes there.

SECTION VIII.

THE AUTHENTICITY OF THE TWO FIRST CHAPTERS.

1. If the view maintained above of the probable time of the publication of the Gospel be adopted,—and its later terminus, the publication of the Acts two years after Paul's imprisonment at Rome began, is, I think, beyond question,—I cannot see how any reasonable doubt can be thrown upon the authenticity of this portion of the narrative. For there were those living, who might have contradicted any false or exaggerated account of our Lord's birth and the events which accompanied it. If not the Mother of our Lord herself, yet His brethren were certainly living: and the universal reception of the Gospel in the very earliest ages sufficiently demonstrates that no objection to this part of the sacred narrative had been heard of as raised by them.

2. The ἀκριβῶς παρακολουθηκότι of Luke forbids us to imagine that he would have inserted any narrative in his Gospel which he had not ascertained to rest upon trustworthy testimony, as far as it was in his power to ensure this: and the means of ensuring it must have been at that time so ample and satisfactory, that I cannot imagine for a moment any other origin for the account, than such testimony.

3. If we enquire what was probably the source of the testimony, I answer, that but one person is conceivable as delivering it, and that person the Mother of our Lord. She was living in the Christian body for some time after the Ascension; and would most certainly have been appealed to for an account of the circumstances attending His birth and infancy.

4. If she gave any account of these things, it is inconceivable that this account should not have found its way into the records of the Lord's life possessed by the Christian Church, but that instead of it a spurious one should have been adopted by two of our Evangelists, and that so shortly after, or even coincident with, her own presence in the Church.

5. Just as inconceivable, even supposing the last difficulty surmounted, is the formation of a mythical, or in any other way unreal account of these things, and its adoption, in the primitive age of the Church. For the establishment of this I refer to the late Professor Mill's able tract, On the Mythic Interpretation of Luke i.;—in which he has stated and severally refuted the arguments of Strauss and the rationalists.

6. I infer then that the two first chapters of this Gospel contain the account given by the Mother of our Lord, of His birth, and its prefatory and attendant circumstances; of some of which circumstances that in Matt. i. 18—25 is a more compendious, and wholly independent account.

SECTION IX.

ITS STYLE AND CHARACTER.

1. We might have expected from Luke's name and profession, that he was a man of education, and versed in the elegant use of the Greek, which was then the polite language in the Roman empire. We accordingly find that while we have very numerous Hebraisms in his Gospel, we also have far more classical idioms, and a much freer use of Greek compounds than in the others. By consulting the marginal references in this edition it will be seen that the number of ἀπαξ λεγόμενα in Luke is very great, far exceeding those in any other Gospel; and that very many of them are classically-authorized compound words.

2. The composition of the sentences is more studied and elaborate than in Matthew or Mark: the Evangelist appears more frequently in the narrative, delivering his own estimate of men and things;—e. g. ch. xvi. 14; vii. 29, 30; xix. 11 al.;—he seems to love to recount instances of our Lord's tender compassion and mercy;—and in the report of His parables, e. g. in ch. xv., is particularly simple in diction, and calculated to attract and retain the attention of his readers.

3. In narrative, this Evangelist is very various, according to the copiousness or otherwise of the sources from which he drew. Sometimes he merely gives a hasty compendium; at others he is most minute and circumstantial in detail, and equally graphic in description with Mark: see as instances of this latter, ch. vii. 14; ix. 29. It has been remarked (see Olshausen, Bibl. Comm. i. p. 20) that Luke gives with extreme accuracy not so much the discourses, as the observations and occasional sayings of our Lord, with the replies of those who were present. This is especially the case in his long and important narrative of the journey up to Jerusalem, ch. ix. 51—xviii. 14.

4. On the question how far those doctrines especially enforced by the great Apostle of the Gentiles are to be traced, as inculcated or brought forward in this Gospel, see above in this chapter, § ii. 7.

5. In completeness, this Gospel must rank first among the four. The Evangelist begins with the announcement of the birth of Christ's Forerunner, and concludes with the particulars of the Ascension: thus embracing the whole great procession of events by which our Redemption by Christ was ushered in, accomplished, and sealed in heaven. And by recording the allusion to the promise of the Father (ch. xxiv. 49), he has introduced, so to speak, a note of passage to that other history, in which the fulfilment of that promise, the great result of Redemption, was to be related. It may be remarked, that this completeness,—while it shews the earnest diligence used by the sacred writer in searching out and making use of every information within his reach,—forms an additional proof that he can never have seen the Gospels of Matthew and Mark,—or he would (to say nothing of the other difficulties attending this view, which have before been dealt with in ch. i.) most certainly have availed himself of those parts of their narratives, which are now not contained in his own.

6. The chronological notice, on the discovery, by the younger Zumpt, that Quirinus was twice governor of Syria, and the light thus thrown on Luke ii. 2, inserted here in the third edition, is now incorporated in the notes ad loc.

CHAPTER V.

THE GOSPEL ACCORDING TO JOHN.

SECTION I.

ITS AUTHORSHIP.

1. THE universal belief of the Christian Church has ascribed this Gospel to the Apostle John. I shall not here anticipate the discussion respecting its genuineness (see below, § vi.), but assume that it has been rightly so ascribed.

2. John was son of Zebedee and Salome, and younger (?)^{*} brother of James. His father was a Galilæan, and by occupation a fisherman on the lake of Galilee. Where he resided, is uncertain: perhaps at Bethsaida: but the circumstance of Simon Peter, who was of that place, being (Luke v. 10) partner in the fishing trade, or perhaps, in that particular expedition only with the sons of Zebedee, is no proof as to their residence there also.

3. The family of John seems not to have been one of the lowest class: we find hired servants in the ship with Zebedee, Mark i. 20; their mother Salome was one of those women who came with Jesus from Galilee, and ministered to Him of their substance, Luke viii. 3; xxiii. 55, compared with Mark xvi. 1; the same Salome was one of those who bought sweet spices and ointments to anoint Him (Mark, ibid.); and, John xix. 27, we find John himself taking the mother of our Lord εἰς τὰ ἰδία, which though (see note there) it need not imply that John had then a house at Jerusalem, certainly denotes that he had some fixed habitation, into which she was received. If, as is most likely, John be meant by the ἄλλος μαθητής of ch. xviii. 15, he was personally known to the High Priest Caiaphas. From all these facts the inference is that his family belonged to the middle class of society; the higher grade of those who carried on the by no means despised or ungainful business of fishermen on the sea of Galilee.

^{*} This is by no means certain. While Matt. and Mark always write 'Peter, James, and John'—Luke, ix. 28, and Acts i. 13 (not in rec.), has 'Peter, John, and James;' although in the other catalogue of the Apostles, Luke vi. 14, he keeps the usual order. It is impossible to say whether the order arose from any account at all being taken of mere seniority.

4. If (see note on John i. 41) the second of the two disciples who heard the Baptist's testimony to Jesus, and followed Him in consequence, was John himself,—we have his acquaintance with our Lord dating from the very beginning of His ministry. And to this agree the contents of chapters ii. iii. iv. v., containing particulars of the Ministry at Jerusalem and in Galilee which happened previous to the commencement of the official record of the other Evangelists. It seems that John accompanied our Lord to Jerusalem,—with perhaps those of the Apostles already called,—and witnessed those incidents which he has related in that part of his Gospel.

5. In the intervals of our Lord's first circuits and journeys, the Apostles seem to have returned to their families and occupations. Thus in Luke v. 1—11, we find the sons of Zebedee, as well as Simon Peter, again engaged in fishing, and solemnly and finally summoned by Jesus to follow Him;—an incident which, as Lücke acknowledges (Comm. in Joh., Einleitung, p. 12), would be inexplicable even by the miracle, unless there had been a previous acquaintance on their part with our Lord.

6. From that time John belonged to that chosen number known as 'the Twelve,' who were nearest to the Person of Jesus during His ministry. And of that number, he seems to have been the most personally beloved by our Lord. For the assumption that he is the author of our Gospel, also identifies him with 'the disciple whom Jesus loved,' so often mentioned in it. (See ch. xiii. 23; xix. 26; xx. 2; xxi. 7, 20, 24.) He, together with his brother James, and Peter, was witness of the raising of Jæirus's daughter, Mark v. 37: also of the transfiguration, Matt. xvii. 1 ff.; and of the agony in Gethsemane: he lay on the bosom of Jesus at the last supper; and was recognized by Peter as being the innermost in His personal confidence, John xiii. 23. To him was committed the charge of the mother of Jesus, by Himself when dying on the Cross, John xix. 26, 27.

7. And to this especial love of the Redeemer John appears to have corresponded in devoted affection and faithfulness. He fled, it is true, with the rest, at the dark hour of the capture of Jesus: but we find him, together with Peter, soon rallying again,—and from that time, John xviii. 15, 16, even to the end, xix. 25 ff., an eye-witness of the sufferings of his divine Master. In John xxi. we find the same personal distinction bestowed on the beloved disciple by our Lord after His Resurrection.

8. In the Acts of the Apostles, John comes before us but very seldom, and always in connexion with and thrown into the background by Peter. See Acts iii. 1 ff.; viii. 14—25. The history leaves him at Jerusalem: where however he appears not to have been on Paul's first visit to Jerusalem, Gal. i. 18 ff., A.D. 38—40 (see chronological table in Prolegg. to Acts, Vol. II.), for he states that he saw none of the Apostles save Peter and James. On his second visit, Acts xi. 29, 30, cir. A.D. 43 (see as above), we have no intimation whether John was there or not. If the journey to determine the question about circumcision, Acts xv. 1, was identical with Paul's third visit, Gal. ii. 1 (which I have maintained in Prolegomena to Acts, Vol. II., p. 26), then at that date (i. e. cir. A.D. 50) John was in Jerusalem. After this time, we lose sight of the Apostles, nor can we with any approach to certainty point out the period of their final dispersion. It took place probably some time between this council and Paul's last visit to Jerusalem, Acts xxi. 18 (cir. A.D. 60), when we find only James resident there.

9. For the after-history of John, we are dependent on tradition. And here we have evidence more trustworthy than in the case of any other Apostle.

(a) It is related by Polycrates Bishop of Ephesus at the end of the second century,—in his Epistle to Victor Bishop of Rome on the keeping of Easter,—that John, whom he numbers among the great lights (σπουδαῖα, see Eusebius, iii. 31, and Heinichen's note) of Asia, died and was buried (κεκοιμηται) in Ephesus.

(β) Irenæus also,—the scholar of Polycarp, who himself was a disciple of John,—relates that John remained in Ephesus till the times of Trajan. (Adv. Hær. ii. 39, p. 148; iii. 1 and 3, pp. 174, 178, cited also by Eusebius, iii. 23.) To the same effect testify Clement of Alexandria (Euseb. ibid.), Origen (Euseb. iii. 1), Eusebius (ibid.), and Jerome (de Viris Illustr. c. 9).

10. But assuming as a fact the long residence and death of the Apostle at Ephesus, we in vain seek any clue to guide us as to the time when, or the place whence, he came thither. The Asiatic Churches were founded by St. Paul, who made it a rule not to encroach on the field of labour of any other Apostle, Rom. xv. 20:—who never, in his Epistles to the Asiatic Churches, makes any mention of nor sends any salutation to John:—who, in his parting speech to the Elders of the Ephesian Church at Miletus (Acts xx.), certainly did not anticipate the coming of an Apostle among them. So much then we may set down as certain, that the arrival of John in Asia must have been after the death of Paul.

11. We may perhaps with some appearance of probability conjecture that the dangers which evidently beset the Asiatic Churches in Paul's lifetime,—and to which Peter in his first Epistle, written to them, not indistinctly alludes (see 1 Pet. i. 14 : ii. 1, 2, 7, 8, 12, 16 al. fr.),—had taken so serious a form after the removal of Paul their father in the faith, that John found it requisite to fix his residence and exercise apostolic authority among them. This is supposed by Lücke, Einl. p. 24, and Neander, Leitung u. Pflanzung der Kirche, 4th edition, p. 614.

12. But we are as far as ever, even if this conjecture be adopted, from arriving at any method of accounting for the interval between John's leaving Jerusalem, and his coming to Asia Minor: a period, on any computation, of nearly six years, A.D. 58—64. It is not necessary, however, as Lücke also observes, to reject a tradition so satisfactorily grounded as that of John's residence and death at Ephesus, on this account;—especially when we consider that we seem compelled to interpose some influence corresponding to that of John, between the state of the Asiatic Churches as shewn in the Pauline Epistles, and that in the time of Polycarp, who immediately followed the apostolic age. See Neander, Leitung u. Pflanzung, 4th edition, p. 615. I reserve the discussion of the other element of uncertainty in this matter,—the possible confusion of two persons named John, the Apostle and the Presbyter, for the Prolegomena to the Second Epistle of John, in Vol. IV.

13. I mention here,—reserving its discussion for the Prolegomena to the Apocalypse, Vol. IV.,—the tradition universally received in the early Church, which records that the Apostle John was exiled under Domitian to the island of Patmos. Assuming the Apocalypse to be his work, the fact of such an exile is established, see Rev. i. 9,—but the time left uncertain. But even those who do not ascribe the Apocalypse to him, relate this exile, e. g. Eusebius, Hist. Eccl. iii. 20.

14. It is also related (Euseb. ibid.) that he returned under Nerva to Ephesus, and that his death (under Trajan, see above) took place (in what manner is uncertain, but probably not by martyrdom) in extreme old age. It would be out of place here to recount the other traditions, some of them highly interesting, which are extant. See one of them in note on 1 John iii. 18, and the whole recounted and commented on in Stanley's Sermons and Essays on the Apostolic Age, pp. 275—289.

SECTION II.

ITS SOURCES.

1. In several places the Author of this Gospel plainly declares or implies that he relates what he had seen and heard. See ch. i. 14; xiii. 2; xviii. 15; xix. 26; xx. 2, and especially xix. 35^{*}. Also xxi. 24.

2. And with this declaration the contents of the Gospel agree. Amidst the entire disregard of minute specifications of sequence or locality as a general rule, in almost every narrative we have undoubted marks of autoptic testimony.

3. The only question which arises on receiving this as the fact, has reference to the diversity of style observed in the discourses of our Lord as related by the three other Evangelists, and as related by John. In their more or less common report, a certain similarity of style is supposed to be observable throughout the parables and sayings of Jesus, which is wholly absent from them in John's Gospel. Let us examine this matter more closely.

4. In order to form a satisfactory judgment on this point, it would be necessary to be in possession of some common matter reported by both. But such common matter, in any sufficient quantity for this purpose, we do not possess. No one discourse is reported by all four. Certain insulated sayings are so reported; e. g. John ii. 19; compare Matt. xxvi. 61, Mark xiv. 58.—John vi. 20; Matt. xiv. 27, Mark vi. 50.—John xii. 7, 8; Matt. xxvi. 10, 11, Mark xiv. 6, 7.—John xiv. 20; Matt. x. 40, Luke x. 16.—John xiv. 21; Matt. xxvi. 21, Mark xiv. 18.—John xiv. 37, 38; Matt. xxvi. 33, and ||.—John xx. 19; Luke xxiv. 36.—Now in these common reports, amidst much variety in verbal and circumstantial detail, such as might have been expected from independent narrators, there is no such difference of style observable.

5. We have then the following remarkable phenomenon presented by the two classes of narrators;—that the sayings of our Lord reported by the one are different from, and exclusive of those contained in the other. And this must very much modify our view of the subject in question.

6. It would be in the highest degree probable that our Lord would discourse mainly and usually on two great branches of divine truth: one of these being, the nature and moral requirements of that kingdom which He came to found among men, which would embrace the greater part of

^{*} On the futility of the attempt to shew from this verse, on account of αὐτίκως, that the eye-witness spoken of is a different person from the writer of the Gospel, see note on the usage of αὐτίκως by our Evangelist, John vii. 20.

His discourses to the multitude,—His outer or popular sayings,—His parables and prophecies:—and the other, the deeper spiritual verities relating to his own divine Person and Mission. Of these latter, there would be two subdivisions: one class of them would be spoken in the gracious condescension of love to His own disciples when conversing privately with them, and the other in the fire of holy zeal when contending against His bitter adversaries, the rulers of the Jews.

7. Now of the two greater classes just mentioned, let us enquire which would most naturally form the matter of the oral apostolic teaching to the Churches in the first age. Let it be remembered that that teaching was mostly elementary,—matter of catechization;—selected for the edification of those who were to be built up as Christian converts. Would it not unquestionably be the first? Granted, that some few of those deeper sayings (deeper, I mean, in their very form and primary reference) might occasionally find their place in the reports of longer discourses (see e. g. Matt. xi. 27: Luke x. 22), yet I cannot imagine the main stream of oral apostolic teaching to have been otherwise composed than as we find it: viz. of the popular discourses and parables of our Lord, to the exclusion for the most part of His inner teaching and deeper revelations respecting his own divine Person. These, in case the Apostles had been suffered by Providence to carry on systematically their testimony to the Church, might have followed after: but certainly they would not be likely to form the first subject of their oral teaching.

8. But that they would dwell powerfully on their minds, and in proportion to their individual receptivity of the Spirit and Person of their Lord, is most evident. And this consideration, united with that of the very nature and purpose of the apostolic office, and with the promise specially recorded that the Spirit should bring to their minds all things which He had said to them, will fully account for there arising, late in the apostolic age, so copious and particular a report of these inner and personal discourses of our Lord.

9. That such a report should be characterized in some measure by the individual mind which has furnished it, was to be expected, on any view of spiritual guidance. But that this individuality has in any considerable degree modified the report, I think extremely improbable. Taking the circumstances into consideration, the relation of John to his divine Master, the employment and station from which he was called, and the facts also which have been noticed respecting the sayings reported by all in common, I think it much more probable, that the character and diction of our Lord's discourses entirely penetrated and assimilated the habits of thought of His beloved Apostle; so that in his first epistle he writes in the very tone and spirit of those discourses; and when reporting the sayings of his own former teacher the Baptist, he gives them, consistently with the deepest inner truth of narration (see note on ch. iii. 31), the forms and cadences so familiar and habitual to himself.

10. It belongs to the present section of our subject, to enquire how far it may be supposed that John had seen or used the synoptic Gospels. I confess myself wholly unable to receive the supposition that any of them, in their present form, had ever been seen by him. On such a supposition, the phenomena presented by his Gospel would be wholly inexplicable. To those parts of it which he has in common with them, the reasonings of the former part of these Prolegg. will apply. And though these are not so considerable in extent as in the case of the three Gospels, yet they are quite important enough to decide this question. The account and testimony of the Baptist in ch. i.;—the miraculous feeding in ch. vi.;—the whole history from ch. xii. 1, in its subject-matter, will come under this description. Let any common passages be selected, and tried by the considerations above advanced, ch. i. § ii.—and our conclusion must be that the report is an independent one, not influenced or modified by theirs. Of those parts of his Gospel which are peculiar to himself, I will speak in another section.

11. It is, however, an entirely distinct question, how far John had in his view the generally-received oral teaching from which our three Gospels are derived. That he himself, answering so strictly to the description in Acts i. 21,—laying so much weight as he does on testimony, ch. i. 19; xix. 35; xxi. 24,—bore his part, and that no inconsiderable one, in the Apostles' witness to the facts of the evangelic history,—I take for granted. It will follow that he was aware of the general nature and contents of that cycle of narratives and discourses of our Lord which became current at Jerusalem from his own testimony and that of the other Apostles. Accordingly we find him in his Gospel assuming as known, certain facts contained in that cycle. See ch. vii. 41, and note,—ch. xi. 1,—also ch. i. 40, where Simon Peter is referred to as one known, before the giving of the latter name is related.

12. I can hardly however suppose, that John wrote with any fixed design of filling up by a supplementary Gospel the deficiencies of the generally-received oral account. Sometimes, e. g. ch. vi. 1—14, xviii., xix., he goes over the same ground with it: and in no part can it by the most ingenious application of the supplementary theory be shewn, that he in any respect produces or aims at the effect of a work designed to fill up and elucidate those which have gone before. This point will be dwelt on more at length in the next section.

13. I have no hesitation, therefore, in receiving as the true account of the source of this Gospel, that generally given and believed;—viz. that we have it from the autoptic authority of the Apostle himself.

SECTION III.

FOR WHAT READERS AND WITH WHAT OBJECT IT WAS WRITTEN.

1. This Gospel presupposes readers already Christians, and was written to build them up and confirm them in the faith. (See ch. xix. 35; xx. 31.) It is, as Lücke remarks (Einl. p. 185), neither complete enough, nor elementary enough, for the first founding of a belief in Christ in the mind. This must have been, even as early as the apostolic times, the work of no written Gospel (see Luke i. 1—4), but of the oral preaching of the word.

2. Being written then for Christian readers, the main and ultimate purpose as regards them is sufficiently declared in ch. xx. 31,—ταῦτα γέγραπται ἵνα πιστεύσῃτε ὅτι Ἰησοῦς ἐστὶν ὁ χριστὸς ὁ υἱὸς τοῦ θεοῦ, καὶ ἵνα πιστεύοντες ζωὴν ἔχητε ἐν τῷ ὀνόματι αὐτοῦ.

3. This purpose however, as it would be common to all the sacred writings of the New Testament more or less, in no way accounts for the peculiar cast of the Gospel, or the portions of the Christian's faith which are most prominently brought out in it. These will require closer examination.

4. It will at once appear, that some especial occasion must have induced John to write so pointedly as he has done on certain doctrines,—and to adopt, in doing so, a nomenclature unknown to the rest of the New Testament writers. Some state of opinion in the Church must have rendered it necessary for the Apostle to state strongly and clearly the truth about which error was prevalent, or questions had been raised: the method of speaking which even he, under the guidance of the Spirit, adopted to convey that truth, must have become familiar to and valued by the educated and philosophic minds in the Christian community.

5. It may be well to set down the opinions of the ancients on this, before we enter into the matter itself.

Irenæus states that John wrote his Gospel to controvert the errors of Cerinthus, and before him the Nicolaitans¹⁰. Tertullian (de Præscript. adv. Hær. 33, p. 46) in the main agrees with this. Epiphanius (Hær. li. 12, p. 433) and Jerome¹ repeat it as a certain fact, that John wrote against ¹⁰ Hanc fidem annuntians Johannes Domini discipulus, volens per evangelii annuntiationem auferre eum qui a Cerintho insemminatus erat hominibus errorem, et multo prius ab his qui dicuntur Nicolaitæ, qui sunt vulsio ejus, quæ falso cognominatur scientia,—ut confunderet eos et suaderet quoniam unus Deus qui omnia fecit per verbum suum, . . . sic inchoavit evangelium, &c. Adv. Hær. iii. 11, p. 188.

Cerinthus ; but instead of the Nicolaitans, they mention the Ebionites. Those who assert him to have written against Valentinus or Marcion are evidently chronologically in error.

6. Several of the ancients give in substance, the supplementary view of the design of John's Gospel. Clement of Alexandria, as cited by Eusebius, Hist. Eccl. vi. 14, related, τὸν Ἰωάννην ἰσχυάτον συνιδόντα ὅτι τὰ σωματικὰ ἐν τοῖς εὐαγγελίοις διδῆλωται, προτραπέντα ὑπὸ τῶν γνωρίμων, πνεύματι θεοφορηθέντα, πνευματικὸν ποιῆσαι εὐαγγέλιον. Eusebius in another place (Hist. Eccl. iii. 24) states, that whereas the other Evangelists wrote the history of the official life of our Lord subsequent to the imprisonment of the Baptist, John wishing that there should be a complete account, gave in his Gospel the particulars preceding that event. The same is repeated almost verbatim by Jerome, ut supra. Later authors (see Lücke, Einleitung, p. 189) reproduced the conjectures of their predecessors as being traditions of the Church ; and for the most part united the polemical with the supplementary theory².

7. None of the above-cited authors appeal to any historical or traditional fact, as the ground of their own statements. Those statements have therefore for us no authority ab extra, and must be judged by their own intrinsic probability or otherwise, as established by the contents of the Gospel, and the state of the Church at the period of its publication. In modern times, these last considerations have given rise to several opinions, which I shall now briefly state ; acknowledging, throughout this part of the section, my obligations to Lücke, whose facts and remarks I have for the most part borrowed.

8. Grotius, and some of the Socinian Commentators, supposed,—on account of the contrast strongly drawn in the prologue, ch. i. and elsewhere, between Jesus Christ as the true Light, and the Baptist as only having come to bear witness of that Light,—that the Evangelist wrote against the so-called disciples of John, who held the Baptist to have been the Messiah. Others (as Herder, Overbeck, Ziegler) thought that the Sabæi, who combined gnostic errors with an overweening estimation of John the Baptist, were principally aimed at. Others, not finding in this a sufficient account of the peculiarities of the Gospel, supposed this or other polemic aims, to have been united with the supplementary one. Of this last number are Storr, Wegscheider, Hug, &c. Others again (as Paulus) finding in the Gospel no sufficient evidence either of a polemical or a supplementary intention, fall back on the didactic aim set forth ch. xx. 31. This view, however, was never found satisfactory to explain the peculiar phenomena of the Gospel.

9. Meantime, however, the critical study of the other Gospels had so far advanced, that it became more and more clearly seen, that the hypothesis of John having been acquainted with, and having wished to complete or correct them, was entirely untenable. Again, not finding traces of a polemical design sufficiently prominent in the Gospel, some critics, slightly altering the term, have supposed it to be apologetic in its character (Hemsen, Seiffarth, Schott). Some, lastly, pronounced it unworthy of the Apostle to follow any secondary designs, considering his own avowal in ch. xx. 30, 31 (Credner). But, as Lücke remarks, even granting this, it may still be a lawful enquiry, What peculiar circumstances led to his realizing this his great design in the present peculiar form of composition. The synoptic Evangelists had, he says, beyond question, the same great design, and yet have followed it in a very different manner. Something of this may doubtless be explained by the individual character of the writer's mind, but clearly not all: and that character itself was modified by surrounding events. We are driven therefore to the special circumstances under which the Gospel, but especially the prologue, which in this matter rules the Gospel, was composed.

10. Into these Lücke enquires under two heads: (1) the relation of John's Gospel to the other three; (2) the character of the age and section of the Church in which the Evangelist lived. In treating the first of these he disproves, much in the same manner as has been done in these Prolegomena, the probability that John intended to supply, or had ever seen, our present Gospels; and maintains that an acquaintance on his part with the general stream of oral testimony from which they were derived, will sufficiently account for the relations observable between him and them. His inference is, that if his Gospel (as undoubtedly is the case) sometimes supplies and gives precision to theirs, this has been only the result, but could in no way be the aim of his writing; the peculiarities and object of which must be altogether accounted for from considerations belonging to the other head of the enquiry.

11. In pursuing this, he distinguishes three classes of writings likely to arise in the apostolic age: (α) the simple committal to paper of the cycles of oral narration, with a view to fixing them for the general and continued edification of the readers. To this class he refers the Gospels of Matthew and Mark. (β) Writings compiled with a more set purpose of giving a complete account, in order, of the events of our Lord's life on earth. In this division he classes the Gospel of Luke. (γ) The third class would arise from the growing up of the faith, which at first was a simple historical belief, into the maturer γνώσις of doctrinal system. In the course of this progress, various questions would arise respecting the life and teaching of the Lord Jesus, which the generally-received oral narration was not competent to answer. And these writings would be composed to satisfy such enquirers by presenting such an apologetic view of the Lord's life, and such a doctrinal account of His teaching, as might tend to set their questionings at rest. To this class he supposes may have belonged some of the gnostic apocryphal writings; and to this class certainly does belong the Gospel of John.

12. At the time of its composition, many questionings were already raised between the believing and unbelieving, and among the believing themselves. Traces of such we find even in the Pauline Epistles, 1 Cor. i. 23; xv. 1. Lücke instances some of these questions which this Gospel was well adapted to answer. (α) The rejection of the Lord Jesus by His own people the Jews, was an event likely to prove a stumbling-block, and to be used by unbelievers against our religion. To the elucidation of this,—the tracing its progress, step by step,—the shewing its increasing virulence amidst the blameless innocence and holy words and deeds of the Redeemer,—does John especially devote the middle and principal section of his Gospel. He shews that thereby His enemies were fulfilling the divine purpose, and that they were even forewarned of this by one among themselves, ch. xi. 51, 52. (β) We may evidently see, from the diligence with which John accumulates autoptic evidence on the subject of the actual death of Christ, and His resurrection, that he has in this part also some in view, who did not receive those great events as undoubted facts, but required the authority of an Apostle to assure them of their truth. (γ) The way also in which he relates the testimonies of our Lord respecting the manner, results, and voluntary nature of His own death,—that it was His true glorification,—that it was undertaken freely, but in complete accordance with the Father's will,—seems to point to doubts as to the character of that event, which the Evangelist meditated removing. (δ) It was certainly, later (see Origen against Celsus, quoted in note on Matt. ix. 9—13), a reproach against the Apostles, that they were low-born and ignorant men. In the case of Paul, we find very early a disposition on the part of some in the Churches, to set aside apostolic authority. And those who were so disposed might perhaps appeal to the oral narrative which forms the foundation of the synoptic Gospels, to prove that the Apostles often misunderstood the sayings of the Lord, and might from thence take occasion to vilify their present preaching as resting on similar misunderstanding. John,—from his relating so much at length the discourse of our Lord in which He promised the Comforter to guide them into all the truth, and bring to their minds all that He had said to them, and from noticing (ch. xii. 16 ; xx. 9) that they understood not certain things at first, which were made clear to them afterwards,—seems to be guarding the apostolic office and testimony from such imputations.

13. But all these designs, possible as they may have been, do not reach so far as to give any account of the very remarkable cast and diction of the prologue. This opening gives a tone to the whole Gospel, being no less than a compendium or programme of its contents, gathered up and expressed according to a nomenclature already familiar to certain persons within the Church. The fact of John having been led to adopt the gnostic term λόγος as the exponent of his teaching respecting the person of our Lord, would of itself make it probable that he had the combating of gnostic error in his view ; or perhaps, speaking more accurately, that he was led to take advantage of the yearnings of the human desire after an universal and philosophic religion,—by grasping and lifting upward into the certainty of revelation the truth which they had shaped to themselves,—and thereby striking off and proscribing their manifold and erroneous conceits. But neither the language of the prologue itself, nor any prominence given to antagonistic truths in the Gospel, justify us in ascribing to the Evangelist a position directly polemical against the peculiar tenets of Cerinthus³. The stand made in the Gospel, is against gnosticism in the very widest sense : in its Ebionitish form, as denying the Divinity and pre-existence of Christ,—and in its Docetic, as denying the reality of His assumption of the Human Nature.

14. While, however, John contends against false γνώσις, he is, in the furtherance and grounding of the true γνώσις, the greatest, as he was the last, of the spiritual teachers of the Church. The great Apostle of the Gentiles, amidst fightings without and fears within, built in his argumentative Epistles the outworks of that temple, of which his still greater colleague and successor was chosen noiselessly to complete, in his peaceful old age, the inner and holier places. And this, after all, ranging under it all secondary aims, we must call the great object of the Evangelist ;—to advance, purify from error, and strengthen, that maturer Christian life of knowledge, which is the true development of the teaching of the Spirit in men, and which the latter part of the apostolic period witnessed in its full vitality. And this, by setting forth the Person of the Lord Jesus in all its fulness of grace and truth, in all its manifestation in the flesh by signs and by discourses, and its glorification by opposition and unbelief, through sufferings and death⁴. That he should have been led to cast his testimony into a form antagonistic to the peculiar errors then prevalent,—that he should have adopted the thoughts and diction of previous seekers after God, so far as they were capable of serving his high purpose and being elevated into vehicles of heavenly truth,—these are arrangements which we may not, because they are natural and probable, the less regard as providential, and admirably designed for that which especially was his portion of the apostolic work,—the PERFECTING OF THE SAINTS ⁵.

SECTION IV.

AT WHAT PLACE AND TIME IT WAS WRITTEN.

1. These two questions, as relating to John's Gospel, are too intimately connected to form the subject of separate sections.

2. The most ancient testimony, that of Irenæus, relates that it was matter copiously and ably handled in vol. i.,—and vol. ii. contains a running commentary in which many striking ideas are suggested. Without subscribing to all Luthardt's views, I cannot but think his book a most valuable contribution to a right understanding of our Gospel. The greater part of the new matter in my notes on St. John is derived from this source. Note to 2nd edition. [I may now say, that having since used Luthardt's book during a continuous pulpit exposition of the earlier part of St. John, I have ever found more and more reason to value it. No such attempt to give a general account of the aims and characteristics of the Gospel has ever before been made. A good translation of it could not fail to bring about in England a worthier appreciation of this wonderful Gospel.—Note to 3rd edition.] [The above opinion remaining in its full force, I may now add, that the second edition of Stier's Reden Jesu notices and reviews throughout the remarks of Luthardt, and forms a very valuable corrective to the sometimes overwrought views of that earnest and delightful writer.—Note to 4th edition.]

⁵ It will be hardly necessary to state, but I do so in order to bring down the views respecting the Gospels advocated in these Prolegomena expressly to the date of this last edition, that additional study, and subsequent reflection, convince me more and more of the untenableness of the ordinary Harmonistic theories, and of that which attributes to St. John the design of supplementing the rest. I need only ask any student, who shares with me the same general idea of the fair and ingenuous principles which should rule our enquiries respecting this subject, to consult the introductions to the Gospels in Dr. Wordsworth's Greek Testament; and I feel assured he will derive similar confirmation, as far as it is gathered from seeing to what shifts the advocates of the procrustean theories are driven. Witness, e. g. the objection (1) and answer, p. 206: where those who doubt, as matter of fact, the communication of the three Gospels to St. John, are charged with disbelief in Inspiration, and are refuted by an a priori decree of Dr. Wordsworth's as to what was "morally certain" to have been the procedure of the Holy Spirit. And this is really but a fair sample of the way in which every received theory of the patristic and middle ages is advocated, and enforced by strong anathemas, in that and similar works. I may also mention, that the remarks in a work entitled "The Gospel of St. Mark, in the Authorized Version, arranged in Parts and Sections, with Titles and Summaries of Contents, Marginal Notes of Time and Place, and a Preface; to which are appended, Cautions against the Greek Testament of Dean Alford, and the Hulsean Lectures of Dean Ellicott. For the Use of Schools and Young Students. By the Rev. J. Forshall, M.A., F.R.S., formerly Fellow of Exeter College, published at *Ephesus*⁶. This testimony is repeated by Jerome⁷ and others, and is every way consonant with what we have above (§ i.) related of the history of the Apostle its author. Some later writers have reported that it was published from Patmos, during John's exile; some have combined the two accounts, and made John dictate the Gospel in Patmos, and publish it at Ephesus after his return. But of these the only account which from its date and character deserves attention, is that of Irenæus.

3. The Gospel itself furnishes only negative or uncertain evidence on this point. From the manner in which the sites and habits of Palestine are spoken of⁸, it seems evident that it was composed at a distance from that country. If again we regard the peculiar nomenclature of the prologue, and enquire to what locality this points, two places occur to us where it would be likely to have been adopted; one of these, Alexandria,—the other, Ephesus. The first of these cities was the home and birthplace of the gnostic philosophy; the other (Acts xviii. 24) was in communication with, and derived its philosophic character from *Alexandria*⁹. Now as no history gives us any account of the Apostle having laboured or ever been at Alexandria, this consideration also forms a presumptive confirmation of the tradition that the Gospel was written at Ephesus.

4. If so, we have some clue, although but an indirect one, to the time at which it was published. If John cannot be supposed to have come thither till some time after the ultimate disappearance of the Apostle Paul from *Asia Minor*¹, then we have obviously a time specified, before which the Gospel cannot have been published.

5. The voice of tradition on this point is very uncertain. Irenæus states that this Gospel was the latest written of the four: which, as he places Mark's and Luke's after the deaths of Peter and Paul (but see Prolegg. to Luke, § iv.), would bring us to a similar date with that pointed out in the preceding paragraph². As usual in traditional matter,—on our advance to later writers, we find more and more particular accounts given:—the year of John's life, the reigning Emperor, &c., under which the Gospel was written³. In all such cases the student, Oxford," have not induced me to modify any of the statements or expressions in these Prolegomena.

6. But we have thus no direct indication, at what date to place the Gospel. On examining its contents, we find no such indication given by them. It is true that the Evangelist speaks in ch. v. 2 of the pool of Bethesda in the present tense as being near the sheepgate, and thence it might seem as if he wrote before the destruction of Jerusalem:—but such indications are confounded by the fact that he alone of the Evangelists speaks of places near Jerusalem, which would remain after the destruction, in the past tense (ch. xi. 18), which seems to shew that no stress is to be laid on such expressions, which were perhaps used by him according to the cast of the particular narrative which he was then constructing, without any reference to the existing state of things at the time of his writing⁴. See, however, note on ch. xi. 18.

7. It has been variously inferred,—from ch. xxi. 18, 19,—that the Gospel must have been published during the lifetime of Peter;—for that, had the Lord's prophecy been fulfilled before the account was written, some notice would have been taken of such fulfilment;—and from ch. xviii. 10, that it cannot have been published till after his death,—for that Peter's name would not have been mentioned, had he been still living. But it is plain that we might just as well argue for ch. xxi. 18, 19, being written after Peter's death, on account of the definiteness of the interpretation there given to the prophecy; and I have shewn in my note on Matt. xxvi. 51, that no stress can be laid on the other inference.

8. Nor do we find any more certain indication by comparison of the Gospel with the First Epistle, or with the Apocalypse. The dates of both these are very uncertain;—and it has been disputed whether their contents presuppose the Gospel or not. Such expressions as ὁ λόγος τῆς ζωῆς, ἡ ζωὴ αἰώνιος, ἥτις ἦν πρὸς τὸν πατέρα καὶ ἐφανερώθη ἡμῖν, 1 John i. 1, 2, and similar ones, make it at least probable, that the Epistle was written after the Gospel (see Lücke, iii. 21 ff.). But how long after, we have no means of even conjecturing. And with regard to the Apocalypse, if we assume the Domitianic date (95 or 96 A.D.), upheld in Prolegg. to Revelation, § ii., we yet get no trustworthy points of comparison whereby to infer the date of the Gospel.

9. Our only resource then must be, the space included between the very wide limits above indicated. The final departure of Paul from Asia Minor, and indeed his death, must be supposed to have happened some time;—this, such as it is, will be our terminus a quo;—and our terminus ad quem, the probable duration of John's life, or more properly speaking, αὐτοῦ ἀπὸ τῆς Πάρμου ἐπάνοδον, τὴν ἐπὶ Κλαυδίου γενομένην Καίσαρος. Epiphan. Hæc. li. 12, p. 433.

⁴ See also ch. xviii. 1; xix. 41.

of his power of writing as we find him writing in this Gospel. And as antiquity testifies that he lived to a great age, and survived his vigour, this latter terminus will be even less definite than the former.

10. One consideration, however, may tend somewhat to narrow its limits. I have argued in the Commentary, that ch. xxi. is a genuine addition by the hand of the Apostle himself, probably in the decline of life, some years at least, from internal evidence of style, after the Gospel was completed. Add to which, as hinted above, that the style of the Gospel is, as Lücke has also remarked, that of a matured, but not of an aged writer.

11. Whether then we set the death of Paul with Wieseler in A.D. 64, or, as upholders of a second Roman imprisonment, in A.D. 68, we perhaps must not in either case allow our terminus a quo to be placed much earlier than 70: nor, supposing John to have been a few years younger than our Lord, can we prolong our later limit much beyond A.D. 85. We should thus have, but with no great fixity either way, somewhere about fifteen years,—A.D. 70—85, during which it is probable that the Gospel was published.

SECTION V.

IN WHAT LANGUAGE IT WAS WRITTEN.

1. The testimony of antiquity is unanimous that John wrote in Greek. (See Lücke, Einleitung, § xi.) Nor is there any reason to doubt the fact. If he lived and taught in Asia Minor, he must have been familiar with the Greek language.

2. Some among the moderns (Salmasius, according to Lücke, the first) have held an Aramaic or Hebrew original. They seem to ground this principally on the citations from the Old Testament being from the Hebrew, not from the LXX. But this latter is by no means without exception: see ch. i. 23; ii. 17; vi. 45; x. 34; xii. 14, 15, 38; xv. 25; xix. 24, 36. That we find other citations (xii. 40; xiii. 18; xix. 37) after the Hebrew solely or principally, was to be expected from the Apostle's personal history, as a Jew of Palestine who had been brought up in the knowledge of the Hebrew original: and is a confirmation of the genuineness of the Gospel. See below in the next section, and Bleek, Beiträge zur Evangelien Kritik, p. 87.

SECTION VI.

ITS GENUINENESS.

1. It would enlarge these Prolegomena too much, to give a detailed history of the recognition of this Gospel, and its impugnors, in ancient times. It may suffice to refer to such works as Lücke's Einleitung, where this history will be found. The result of his researches on the subject is, that down to the end of the second century the Gospel was by all recognized and attributed to the Apostle whose name it bears, with the sole exception of the Alogi, an unimportant sect in Asia Minor, who, from excessive opposition to the heresy of Montanus, rejected both the Apocalypse and Gospel of John, as favouring (according to them) some of the views of that heretic. Such an exception rather strengthens than weakens the general evidence of ancient Christendom in its favour.
Vol. I.—65]

2. Equally satisfactory is the testimony of the fathers after the close of the second century. The citations by Irenæus from this Gospel are very frequent, and express, both as to its canonicity and the name of its author. And his testimony is peculiarly valuable, because (1) he was an anti-gnostic: (2) his acquaintance with the whole Church, Eastern and Western, was greater than that of any other ecclesiastical writer: and (3) in his youth he had conversed with Polycarp, himself a disciple of the Apostle John. Theophilus of Antioch, Tertullian, Clement of Alexandria, Hippolytus, Origen, Dionysius of Alexandria, Eusebius,—the ancient Syriac version, the Peschito,—the adversaries of Christianity, Porphyry, and Julian,—all these refer to the Gospel as without doubt the work of the Apostle John.

3. We may then, as far as antiquity is concerned, regard its genuineness as established. But there is one circumstance which has furnished many modern writers with a ground for doubting this. Neither Papias, who carefully sought out all that Apostles and apostolic men had related regarding the life of Christ,—nor Polycarp, who was himself a disciple of the Apostle John,—nor Barnabas, nor Clement of Rome, in their Epistles, nor lastly Ignatius (in his genuine writings), makes any mention of, or allusion to, this Gospel. So that in the most ancient circle of ecclesiastical testimony, it appears to be unknown or not recognized.

4. But this circumstance, when fairly considered in connexion with its universal recognition by writers following on these, rather serves for a confirmation of the genuineness of this Gospel. It confessedly was written late in the apostolic age. As far then as silence (or apparent silence) can be valid as an argument, it seems to shew that the recognition of this Gospel, as might have been expected, was later than that of the others. And it is some confirmation also of this view, that Papias, if Eusebius (iii. 39) gives his testimony entire, appears not to recognize Luke's Gospel, but only those of Matthew and Mark. It is remarkable, however, on the other hand, that Papias (Eusebius, ibid.) recognizes the First Epistle of John, which, as remarked in § iv., was probably written after the Gospel. This would seem to make it probable that we have not in Eusebius the whole testimony of Papias given; for it would certainly seem from internal grounds that the First Epistle and the Gospel must stand or fall together.

5. It is evident that too much stress must not be laid on the silence of Polycarp, from whom we have one short epistle only. He also (apparently) was acquainted with the First Epistle of John*. But he wrote with no purpose of giving testimony to the sacred books, and what reason therefore have we to expect in his Epistle, quotations from or allusions to any particular book which did not happen to come within his design, and the subject of which he was treating?

6. The same may be said of the silence of Barnabas, Hermas, and Ignatius. Had any intention existed on the part of the primitive Christian writers of informing posterity what books were counted canonical in their days, their silence would be a strong argument against any particular book:—but they had no such intention: their citations are fortuitous, and most of them loose and allusory only. So that we cannot argue from such silence to the recognition or otherwise of any book, unless it be universal and continuous, which is not the case with regard to this Gospel.

7. Again, the kind of testimony furnished by Irenæus is peculiarly valuable. He does not relate from whom he had heard that John wrote a Gospel, but he treats and quotes it as a well-known and long-used book in the Christian Church. What could have induced Irenæus to do this, except the fact of its being thus known and used? So that this character of his testimony virtually carries it back farther than its actual date. Besides, when one who has had the means which Irenæus had of ascertaining the truth in a matter, asserts things respecting that matter,—the ordinary and just method is to suppose that he draws his information from his superior opportunities of gaining it, even though he may not expressly say so: so that when Irenæus, who had conversed with Polycarp himself, the friend of the Apostle John, quotes this Gospel as the work of that Apostle, we may fairly presume that he had assured himself of this by the testimony of one so well capable of informing him.

8. Another historical argument used against its genuineness is,—that in the dispute about the time of keeping Easter between Polycarp and Anicetus bishop of Rome about the year 160, the former defended the practice of the Asiatic Churches,—which was to keep their Christian passover at the time of the Jewish passover, the evening of the 14th of Nisan, by what he had learned from John and the other Apostles (Eusebius, Hist. Eccl. v. 24). But, say the opponents, John himself in his Gospel clearly relates that our Lord instituted the Lord's supper on the evening of the 13th of Nisan, and was crucified on the 14th. Therefore either Polycarp falsely appealed to John's authority, which is not probable, or John did not write the Gospel which bears his name. But, as Lücke has shewn, this argument is altogether built on the assumption that the Christian passover must necessarily coincide with the time of the institution of the Lord's supper; whereas such a coincidence does not appear to have entered into the consideration of the litigants in this case, but merely the question, whether the Churches should follow the Jewish calendar, or an arrangement of their own. Even in the later dispute between Polycrates, bishop of Ephesus, and Victor (Eusebius, ut supra), on the same point, this question was not raised, but the matter was debated on other grounds.

9. The last historical objection which I shall notice is, that this Gospel was first circulated by the Gnostics, and therefore is to be looked on with suspicion. But Lücke has shewn (Einl. p. 119) that this was not the case: that unquestionable traces of catholic reception of it are found before it was received by them: and that, at all events, Irenæus recognized and used it contemporaneously with the Valentinians. The known opposition between the catholic Fathers and the Gnostics furnishes a sure guarantee, that, had they first promulgated the Gospel, it never would have been received into the Canon of the catholic Church.

10. The modern opponents of the genuineness and canonicity of this Gospel have raised two arguments against it upon internal evidence. The first of these rests upon the assumed radical diversity between the views of the Person and teaching of Christ presented to us by John, and by the synoptic Evangelists. On this point I have said nearly all that is necessary in § ii.; and I will only now add, that supposing the diversity to be as unaccountable as it is natural, it would of itself serve as a strong presumption that the Gospel was not the work of a forger, who would have enlarged and decorated the accounts already existing, but a genuine testimony of one who was not an imitator of nor dependent on those others.

11. The second endeavours, by bringing out various supposed inconsistencies in the narration, to shew that the Apostle John cannot have been the Author. Such are,—imagined want of connexion in certain parts (ch. iv. 44; xiii. 20; xiv. 31, where see notes);—an imputed inconsistency in the character and development of the treachery of Judas (see note on ch. vi. 64);—the not naming once in the Gospel of his own brother James (which, as Lücke remarks, is far easier to account for on supposition of its genuineness than on that of its spuriousness*);—the supposed want of accurate information with regard to the geography and customs of Judæa. But again, the passages cited to support this involve only geographical and archaeological difficulties, such as would never have been raised by an impostor;—and one in particular (ch. vii. 52: see note there) is chargeable, not on the Evangelist, but on the Sanhedrim, who were likely enough to have made the mistake, or purposely overlooked the fact, in their proud spirit of contempt for Galilee. The other objections derived from internal considerations are hardly worth recounting. They are fully stated and answered by Lücke, Einleitung, pp. 136—140.

12. An hypothesis was advanced by Eckermann, Vogel, and Paulus, and brought to completeness by Weisse, founded on a compromise between the evidence for and against the Gospel: that it is partly genuine, and principally in the didactic portions, which are veritable notices from the Apostle John: but that a later hand has wrought upon these, and added most of the narrative portions. But first, ecclesiastical tradition gives no countenance to this, always citing the Gospel as a whole,—and dropping no hint of any such distinction between its parts;—and secondly, it is quite impossible to draw any line in the Gospel itself which shall separate the original matter from the supposed additions. There certainly is a marked distinction in diction and style between the rest of the Gospel and ch. xxi. (of ch. vii. 53—viii. 12, I do not now speak; see notes there):—which I believe to be accounted for by that chapter being a later addition by the Author himself: but farther than this, no such distinction can, even by the most fanciful analogies, be established. The same spirit pervades the form of the narrative and didactic parts: and so strongly, that the impugnors of the Gospel have made this very circumstance an argument against the authenticity of the latter;—how unjustly, I have shewn above in § ii.:—but the fact of the objection having been made is important, as fatal to Weisse's hypothesis.

13. The principal arguments against the genuineness of the Gospel have been repeated and elaborated by Baur (in Zeller's Theologisches Jahrbuch, 1844, 1. 3. 14), who tries to shew that the whole is apocryphal,—and has arisen from a pious fraud of an author in the latter part of the second century. I mention this attempt because an admirable answer to it has appeared, by Ebrard, Das Evangelium Johannis und die neueste Hypothese über seine Entstehung, pp. 217. Zurich, 1845. In this work he has gone over carefully all the arguments treated in the preceding sections, and shewn their entire untenableness. Luthardt also, in the work above referred to, has treated at length of the view of Baur and his school, vol. i. pp. 230—237.

Apostles from the historic field of view. It is very unlikely that John would have introduced mention of him merely because he was his brother. He has not named several others of the Apostles. See ch. xxi. 2, and note.

14. Our conclusion then from internal as well as external evidence, must be that the Gospel is what it has generally been believed to be,—the genuine work of the Apostle John. And this result has been obtained by rigid criticism, apart from all subjective leanings either way. To dilate on the importance of this conclusion, does not belong to these Prolegomena; but I cannot avoid pointing it out, in an age when on the one hand the historic truth of our scriptural accounts is being again boldly denied;—and on the other, we providentially stand at a point in the progress of criticism, where none but the most rigid trial of them, —none but the fairest and most impartial judgments,—can or ought to satisfy us.

SECTION VII.

ITS STYLE AND CHARACTER.

1. This is the only one of the four Gospels to which a pre-arranged and systematic plan can with any certainty be ascribed. That such does not exist in the other three, any farther than the circumstances under which they were each respectively written have indirectly modified their arrangement, has been already shewn. But that such a plan is proposed and followed out by the Writer of this Gospel, will become evident by an examination of its contents.

2. The prologue contains a formal setting forth of the subject-matter of the Gospel:—‘that the Eternal Creator Word became Flesh, and was glorified by means of that work which He undertook in the flesh.’ This glorification of Christ he follows out under several heads: (1) the testimony borne to Him by the Baptist; (2) His miracles; (3) His conflict with the persecution and malice of the Jews; (4) His own testimony in His discourses, which are very copiously related; (5) His sufferings, death, and resurrection. And this His glorification is the accomplishment of the purpose of the Father, by setting Him forth as the Light and Life of the world,—the One Intercessor and Mediator, by whose accomplished Work the Holy Spirit is procured for men; and through whom all spiritual help, and comfort, and hope of glory, is derived.

3. Several subdivisions of the Gospel have been proposed, as shewing its arrangement in subordination to this great design. The simplest and most satisfactory is that adopted by Lücke: (1) the prologue, ch. i. 1—18; (2) the first main division of the Gospel, i. 19—xii. 50; (3) the second main division of the Gospel, xiii. 1—xx. 31; (4) the appendix, ch. xxi.

4. Of these divisions, I. the prologue, contains a general statement of the whole subject of the Gospel. II. The first main division treats of the official work of the Lord in Galilee, Judæa, and Samaria, His reception and rejection, and closes with the general reflections of the Evangelist, ch. xii. 37—43, and summary of the commission of Jesus, ib. 44—50:—its foundation in the will of the Father, and purposes of grace and love to men. III. The second main division may be subdivided into two parts, (1) the inner glorification of Christ in His last supper and His last discourses, (2) His outer and public glorification by His Sufferings, Death, and Resurrection. Then IV. the appended chapter xxi. relates, for a special purpose, an appearance of the Lord, after His resurrection, in Galilee:—see notes there.

5. In all these, except the last, the great leading object of the Gospel is kept in view, and continually worked out more fully. After having stated it in the prologue, he relates the recognition of Christ's glory by the testimony of the Baptist;—then by the disciples on their being called;—then the manifestation of that glory by His miracle in Cana of Galilee,—by His cleansing of the temple,—by His declaration of Himself to Nicodemus,—and so onwards. But the more this is the case, the more is He misunderstood and withstood: and it becomes evident by degrees, that the great shewing forth of His glory is to be brought about by the result of this very opposition of His enemies. This reaches its height in the prophetic testimony of Caiaphas, ch. xi. 47 ff.; and the voice from heaven, xii. 28, ἰδύσατα καὶ πάλιν δοξάσω, seems to form the point of transition from the manifestation of His glory by His acts, discourses, and conflict with the Jews, in Part I.—to that by His Sufferings, Death, and Resurrection in Part II. Thus, as Lücke remarks, these words form the ground-tone of the whole Gospel,—‘The public working of Christ manifested His glory; but at the same time led on to His Death, which Death again manifested His glory.’

6. In the course of the Gospel the Evangelist steadily keeps his great end in view, and does not turn aside from it. For its sake are the incidents and notices introduced, with which his matter is diversified; but for its sake only. He has no chronological, no purely historical aims. Each incident which is chosen for a manifestation of the Lord's glory, is introduced sometimes with very slight links, sometimes with altogether no links of connexion to that which has preceded. So that while in the fulfilment of its inner design the Gospel forms a closely connected and perfect whole, considered in any other view it is disjointed and fragmentary⁷.

⁷ Luthardt's division is:

I. JESUS THE SON OF GOD: ch. i.—iv.

1. The Christ. ch. i. 1—18.

2. The introduction of Jesus into the world (i. 19—ii. 11) by the testimony (a) of the Baptist (i. 19—40); (b) of Himself (i. 41—ii. 11).

7. With regard to the style of this Gospel, it may be remarked, (1) that Dionysius of Alexandria, as cited by Eusebius, Hist. Eccl. vii. 25, remarked the purity of its Greek as compared with that of the Apocalypse. τὰ μὲν γὰρ (the Gospel and First Epistle) οὐ μόνον ἀπταιστως κατὰ τὴν τῶν Ἑλλήνων φωνήν, ἀλλὰ καὶ λογιώτατα ταῖς λέξεσι, τοῖς συλλογισμοῖς, ταῖς συντάξεσι τῆς ἐρμηνείας γέγραπται. πολλοῦ γε δεῖ βάρβαρόν τινα φθόγγον, ἢ σολοικισμόν, ἢ ὅλως ἰδιωτισμὸν ἐν αὐτοῖς εὐρεθῆναι. (2) That without subscribing to the whole of this eulogy, if classical authors are to be the standard of comparison, the same will hold good of this Gospel as compared with the other three. (3) That the greater purity of its Greek is perhaps mainly owing to its far greater simplicity of style. While the deepest truths lie beneath the words, the words themselves are almost colloquial in their simplicity; the historical matter is of small amount as compared with the dialogue. (4) That while the language is for the most part unobjectionable Greek, the cast of expression and thought is Hebraistic. 'Sermo quidem Græcus sed plane adumbratus ex Syriaco illius sæculi' (Grotius). There is, both here and in the Epistle, very little unfolding or deducing one proposition from another: different steps of an argument, or sometimes different

3. First revelation of Himself as the Son of God (ii. 12—iv. 54), (a) in Jerusalem and Judæa (ii. 12—iii. 36), (b) in Samaria and Galilee (iv. 1—54).

II. JESUS AND THE JEWS: ch. v.—xii.

1. Jesus the Life. Opening of the conflict. ch. v. vi. (a) His divine working as Son of God—beginning of opposition (v. 1—47): (b) Jesus the Life in the flesh,—progress of belief and unbelief (vi. 1—71).
2. Jesus the Light. Height of the conflict. ch. vii.—x. (a) He meets the unbelief of the Jews at Jerusalem (vii. 1—52): (b) opposition between Jesus and the Jews at its height (viii. 12—59): (c) Jesus the Light of the world for salvation, and for judgment (ix. x.).
3. The delivery of Jesus to death is the Life and the Judgment of the world. ch. xi. xii. (a) The raising from the Dead (xi. 1—57): (b) Prophetic announcements of the Future (xii. 1—36): (c) Final judgment on Israel (ib. 37—50).

III. JESUS AND HIS OWN: ch. xiii.—xx.

1. Jesus' Love and the belief of His disciples. (a) His Love in condescension (xiii. 1—30): (b) His Love in keeping and completing the disciples in the faith (xiii. 31—xvi. 33): (c) His Love in the exaltation of the Son of God (xvii.).
2. Jesus the Lord: the unbelief of Israel, now in its completion: the belief of His own (ch. xviii.—xx.). (a) His free self-surrender to His enemies, and to the unbelief of Israel (xviii. 1—xix. 16): (b) His self-surrender to Death, and divine testimony in death (xix. 16—42): (c) His manifestation of Himself as passed from death into liberty and life, and the completion of the disciples' faith worked thereby (xx. 1—29).

The APPENDIX: ch. xxi. The glimpse into the future. (a) The symbolic draught of fishes (1—8): (b) the symbolic meal (9—14): (c) The calling and its prospect (15—23): (d) conclusion.

These leading sections he follows out into minor detail in other subdivisions of much interest.

conclusions from mutually dependent arguments, are indicated by mere juxtaposition:—and the intelligent reader must be carrying on, as it were, an undercurrent of thought, or the connexion will not be perceived. (5) That in this respect this Gospel forms a remarkable contrast to those parts of the New Testament written by Hellenistic Christians; e. g. the Epistles of Paul, and that to the Hebrews; in which, while external marks of Hebraistic diction abound, there is yet an internal conformation of style, and connexion of thought, more characteristic of the Grecian mind:—they write more in periods, and more according to dialectic form. In observing all such phenomena in our sacred writings, the student will learn to appreciate the evidence which they contribute to the historic truth of our belief with regard to them and their writers:—and will also perceive an admirable adaptation of the workman to his work, by Him whose one Spirit has overruled them all.

8. The reader will find a very elaborate and detailed account of the peculiarities of diction and style of this Gospel in Luthardt's work referred to above, vol. i. pp. 21—69.

CHAPTER VI.

SECTION I.

OF THE ARRANGEMENT OF THE TEXT IN THIS EDITION.

1. In order to set clearly before the student the principles on which the text has been revised, it may be well to premise a short account of what has been hitherto done towards its revision in modern times.

2. The received text of the Greek Testament is that of the second Elzevir edition, published at Leyden in 1633, and founded on a collation of the third edition of Robert Stephens (1550),—which itself was founded on the fifth edition of Erasmus (1535),—with Beza's editions. The term 'received text' appears to have originated in an expression used by the Elzevirs in their preface—'Textum ergo habes nunc ab omnibus receptum, in quo nihil immutatum aut corruptum damus.' (For particulars respecting the previous editions of the Greek Testament, see Wetstein, prolegomena, p. 116 ff.: and Tregelles, "Printed text of the Greek Test.")

3. The critical authority of the received text is very feeble.—The fifth edition of Erasmus mentioned above was nearly a reprint of his fourth, which was founded on his former editions corrected by the * Complutensian, which had just been published at that time. But neither Erasmus nor the Complutensian editors had before them any sufficient critical apparatus whereupon to construct their text;—nor did the latter use faithfully even that which they had. Wetstein has shewn that their text is singularly corrupted and inaccurate. Erasmus also, besides committing numerous inaccuracies, tampered with the readings of the very few MSS. which he collated⁹. Stephens has given but a very vague account of the additional MSS. to which he had access, and the work appears to have been done with levity and carelessness. The Elzevirs differ from Stephens's third edition in about 150 readings only. (Tischendorf, ed. 7, p. lxxxv.)

4. The first systematic attempt to revise the received text which I shall notice here, as embracing in itself some previous partial ones, is that of J. J. Griesbach, whose edition (complete) appeared in 1796—1806. He collected and systematized the previous labours of Mill and Wetstein, adding to them very many collations of his own. His theory of various recensions of the Greek text apparent in the different classes of MSS., although arbitrarily carried out by him and those who have adopted it from him, has certainly a foundation in truth, and corresponds in the main to the phenomena:—but it misled him in the recension of the text. Nor has he been sufficiently careful in his collation of the principal MSS., nor consistent in the application of his own critical rules. Besides which, the number and complexity of his symbols indicating his judgment on the quality of the readings, form an objection to his edition as furnishing a text for general use.

5. The next considerable attempt to revise the text is found in the edition of Dr. Scholz, late Roman Catholic professor of sacred literature at Bonn. In his extensive travels undertaken in pursuance of his work, he discovered, and cursorily collated very many MSS. unknown before:—and in this, the pioneering department of criticism, his services were considerable. But the theory which he upheld with regard to the recension of the text is as untenable, as his own departure from it is manifest. He adopts, in the main, Griesbach's classification of MSS., arranging

* Published at Alcalá (Complutum) in Spain, under the superintendence of Cardinal Ximenes. This edition was ready in 1514, two years before Erasmus published his first edition; but, from various delays, not published till 1522, after Erasmus had published his third.

them however in two great families or recensions, the Alexandrine and the Constantinopolitan. Of these he holds that the latter contain the true original text of the sacred books, the former having been altered and corrupted by transcribers and grammarians. But notwithstanding this, he continually receives into his text, in almost every page, Alexandrine readings, against the nearly unanimous testimony of the Constantinopolitan MSS.¹ In fact, his is a text constructed in spite of, not according to, his theory. Besides which, with all respect for Dr. Scholz's labours in the cause of biblical criticism, it must be confessed that the extreme inaccuracy of his edition of the New Testament renders it almost unfit for the use of the scholar².

6. In 1831 a stereotype edition of the New Testament appeared, followed in 1842 by a first part, containing the Gospels, of a larger edition with various readings and the Latin Vulgate annexed, by C. Lachmann. The view with which he reconstructed his text is explained at length in his prolegomena to the edition of 1842. He professes to give the text as it was received in the East in the fourth century. To this end he cites as his authorities *entirely the older MSS.*³ A B C P Q T Z in the Gospels as of primary, and D as of secondary authority: neglecting altogether the other uncial MSS. and all the cursive mss.:—of the versions he lays most stress (and properly) on the ancient latin, represented by its most important MSS., a, b, c, D-lat, but to the entire neglect of the important syrr., copt., æth., arm., sah.⁴ Of the Fathers, in the Gospels he cites Origen only as of primary authority,—Irenæus, Cyprian, Hilary, and Lucifer as of secondary;—and lastly, the vulgate of Jerome. But this rejection of the greater part of the witnesses for the text has reduced him, in a very considerable part of the New Testament, to implicit following of one MS. only (e. g. A does not contain Matt. i.—xxv. 6, besides other lacunæ; B does not contain the Epistles to Timothy, Titus, and Philemon, nor the Apocalypse; and the lacunæ in C are large and frequent). Besides which, he has not consistently

² So viel aber ist entschieden daß man den Angaben dieses Kritikers nimmer mit Zuversicht vertrauen kann, und daß seine Arbeiten, die denen welche sich damit befassen nur vergebliche Mühe und Zeit kosten, als völlig unbrauchbar möglichst bald der Vergessenheit überliefert werden sollten. Es gibt wenig Zeilen im Vol. I. dieses N. T. worin sich nicht irgend eine Incorrectheit nachweisen ließe. Schulz, cited by Tischendorf, ed. Lips. 2, prolegg. p. xxxix,—who adds: 'Quod D. Schulz testatus est; Es gibt wenig Zeilen u. s. w.: id majorem in modum in vol. II. quadrare quævis pagina docet.'

followed his own system, as Tischendorf, ed. Lips. 2, prolegg. p. xlv, has shewn by many instances. And he has not taken the pains which he should have done to obtain the best collations of the Vatican MS. (B), by far the most important for his work⁵; having neglected altogether that of Bartolucci, which was known and accessible to him;—nor of the Parisian Codex Ephremi (C), which was also accessible to him, but which he has taken from the imperfect collation of Wetstein.

7. These defects necessarily take off considerably from the otherwise valuable services of Lachmann to N. T. criticism. And it is much to be lamented that, owing to the nature of his plan, and the fact of its never having been thoroughly carried out, his work has ever been very generally and fatally misunderstood, and its readings cited by ignorant persons as if they were the result of the Editor's deliberate judgment. All this ought in fairness to be recognized, when we discuss the residuum of value which Lachmann's provisional labours now possess for the biblical student. It is undoubtedly true, as Dr. Tregelles has observed,—"Printed text of the Greek Test.," p. 118,—that, "let any objections be raised to the plan, let inconsistencies be pointed out in the execution, let corrections of varied kinds be suggested, still the fact will remain, that the first Greek Testament, since the invention of printing, edited wholly on ancient authority, irrespective of modern traditions, is due to CHARLES LACHMANN." At the same time the student must take care to keep this high praise in its proper place. Lachmann's was the work of a pioneer, not that of a builder. It was not in his design, in the work which we now possess, to give us a critical and trustworthy text. This he might have done, had he lived, and had he not been deterred and discouraged by the general misunderstanding of what he had done. His real service to the cause of sacred criticism has been, the bold and uncompromising demolition of that unworthy and pedantic reverence for the received text, which stood in the way of all chance of discovering the genuine word of God; and, the clear indication of the direction which all future sound criticism must take, viz. a return to the evidence of the most ancient witnesses. For the firm hold which this latter principle has taken, for the comparative absence of blind favoritism of the received text, in spite of repeated attempts to shake the one and to re-establish the other, we have mainly to thank Lachmann: and this,—even in the midst of all conceded objections to his plan, to his carrying it out, and to his tone and temper,—is surely no mean eulogy.

For further and full description of his Edition, see Tregelles, "Printed text," &c., pp. 97—115.

⁵ See below, ch. vii. § i. catalogue of MSS. under B.

8. Dr. Tischendorf has published at Leipzig several editions of the Greek Testament. I shall speak here of two only: the second, which appeared in 1849, and the seventh, in 1859. In his revision of the text, as explained in his prolegomena to the edition of 1849, he has followed the most ancient MSS., not however disregarding the testimony of the later ones and of versions and fathers, where the former disagree, or where the readings of the elder MSS. have apparently sprung from corruption of the text. And to judge of this last, he lays down the following rules:—Readings are to be suspected,—1. which are peculiar to one or other of the elder MSS., or which savour strongly of the character of some one class of recensions, and have therefore probably proceeded from some corrector:—2. which although supported by many MSS., have manifestly or probably sprung from the error of a copyist:—3. which have sprung from a desire to assimilate citations from the Old Testament to the text of the cited passage, or parallel places in the Gospels to one another. In such cases (unless there be strong cause to the contrary) the discrepant reading is to be preferred to the accordant one. 4. A reading is to be preferred, which appears to furnish a clue to the others, or to contain the elements of them in itself. 5. The usage of the New Testament writers in general, and of each one in particular, is to be regarded in balancing readings with one another. For the discussion of these rules, I refer the student to the work itself. The theory of them is unobjectionable; it will be by the practical carrying out of them that the New Testament Editor must be judged. And, on the whole, his principles appear to have been boldly and consistently carried out; and the text of this edition of 1849 is, in my view, very far superior to any which preceded it. The fact of my never having adopted it myself, will shew that I do not consider this praise to be in all cases deserved. The edition is very unequal in its various parts. His design grew on him as he advanced, and he did not re-write the earlier portion to correspond with the later. In the Epistles, he gave in full the authorities for the reading which he adopted, as well as those for that which he rejected: in the Gospels, very rarely the latter,—sometimes neither. Indeed the digest, in the early Gospels, was miserably meagre. Full one-third of the readings of D were omitted, as well as many others of importance. Compare only, e. g., the various readings of Matt. xii. 1—8 with those in Lachmann. And the same is true of almost every page. His adoption of readings was not always distinguished by watchfulness to detect trips of transcribers, as e. g. in John vi. 51, where the homeöteleuton ἐξω—ἐξω was obviously the first source of confusion: see also Luke xxiv. 51, 52. But, allowing for such imperfections, and for instances of carelessness such as are incident to all who undertake a work of this kind, I cannot but regard Tischendorf's 2nd edition as the most valuable contribution, at the time of its appearance, which had been yet made to the revision of the text of the New Testament. And I believe that all future texts arranged on critical principles, will be found to approach very closely to his. Such has been the case with my own, although in every instance of correction or re-arrangement I have been led, not by him, but as the careful reader may see, by the rules which he and I have followed in common. And it will be found by any who will take the trouble to compare our texts, that the differences between us are both numerous and important.

9. Tischendorf's seventh edition is a far larger work, and, on account of its many departures from the second and subsequent ones⁶, requires special notice.

As far as regards uniformity of plan and execution, this edition is certainly superior to the second. The array of witnesses cited for and against the text adopted is every where as copious as circumstances would admit. But it may be doubted whether in point of text this later edition is any advance on that other. While professing the same critical principles as before, the Editor has involved himself far more in subjective speculations, the tendency of which has been to lead him away in very many instances from the safe path of the consensus of our most ancient evidence, into the defence of a speculative text, respecting which arbitrary opinion may be as strongly pronounced on one side as on the other. This habit has resulted in a going back in a number of passages to the received text: so much so, that the defenders of that text against ancient evidence have claimed this edition of Tischendorf's as a victory on their side'. Undoubtedly, on all sound critical principles, it must be regarded, as far as its text is concerned, as a retrogression, rather than an advance, since that of the edition of 1849.

10. It is much to be regretted that in many particulars Tischendorf's digest should still present so many marks of inaccuracy; and that, where not borne out by others, so little reliance can be placed upon its citations of versions and Fathers. This is the universal testimony of those who have taken the pains to compare his citations with the originals: and I can add to it from my own experience. When I have had occasion to search the works of a Father to discover the real bearing of a passage which has been obscured by being partially extracted in his notes, I have, at least as often as not, found that it ought not to have been alleged as evidence.

⁶ This term must, in Tischendorf's case, be taken with some qualification. His various editions do not represent successive deliberate recensions of his text and digest, nor do they embrace the same design, as in most other works: but they are merely, for the most part, varying forms under which he has issued his text, with or without an abbreviated digest of various readings. Properly speaking, we have had but three editions from him: the first in 1841, the second in 1849, and the third in 1857-9.

11. And the complaints made with regard to the versions are even more loud and general. The charges are made against Tischendorf, that he has referred very carelessly to the Curetonian Syriac: that in the case of the important Syriac version (Peshito) he relies on the Latin translation of Leusden and the very unsatisfactory edition of Schaaf: and it would appear certain from his silence (Proleg. edn. 7, p. xix) that he has neglected the much more important editions of Widmanstadt and Lee (see Tregelles, Horne's Introd. to N. T. vol. iv. p. 260). He has passed over in silence the edition of the Coptic (Memphitic) version of the Acts and Epistles by Dr. Paul Bötticher—which though not perfectly satisfactory, should still not have been left unconsulted by a professed critical Editor—and has relied on the very incorrect Latin of the older edition of Wilkins. Again, in the case of the Armenian version, he has trusted wholly to the incorrect and partial collations (Tregelles, ib. p. 311) which were made for the N. T. edited by Scholz. It is also not unjust to say, that I have been informed by a friend who has some knowledge of the original languages, that in the case of other versions, where Tregelles and Tischendorf differ in their statement of the readings adopted and the impressions given by an ancient version, the English Editor is commonly right, and the German Editor commonly wrong.

12. Still, with all these faults, Tischendorf's last edition is an indispensable book to the thorough biblical scholar. Its research, and accumulation of testimonies are wonderful, considering that they are the work of one man: and the digest contains what must necessarily form the materials for all future revisions of the N. T. text. It is all the more to be regretted that such a work should be disfigured by blemishes so considerable, and should not have been carefully kept free from those elements of untrustworthiness, which its Author was so ready to point out and insist on in his predecessor, Dr. Scholz.

13. In 1857, Dr. Tregelles published the first part of his edition of the Greek Testament, containing the Gospels of St. Matthew and St. Mark: and in 1861, the second part, containing the Gospels of St. Luke and St. John. The ends which he proposes are thus stated in his Introductory notice:—

I. To give the text of the New Testament on the authority of the ancient witnesses, MSS., and versions, with the aid of the earlier citations, so as to present, as far as possible, the text best attested in the earlier centuries.

II. To follow certain proofs when obtainable, which carry us as near as possible to the apostolic age.

III. So to give the various readings, as to make it clear what is the evidence on both sides: and always to give the whole of the testimony of the ancient MSS. (and of some which are later in date but old in text), of the versions as far as the seventh century, and the citations down to Eusebins inclusive.

In order to accomplish this end, Dr. Tregelles has himself spent much time on the labour of collating and re-collating, and has availed himself of trustworthy materials before collected by others.

14. It will be superfluous, to those who are acquainted with the character of Dr. Tregelles's previous biblical labours, to say that his work has been done with scrupulous fidelity and accuracy. And it is on this ground principally that his Edition is so peculiarly valuable: that we every where are assured of the ground on which we stand: and are not left to the fallacious influence of vast catalogues of authorities on which we know not whether we can fairly depend.

15. It was perhaps to be expected, that Dr. Tregelles, approaching biblical criticism from the side of faithful research and thorough assurance of his ground, should be somewhat more dependent than others on mere diplomatic evidence, and less alive to the necessity of judiciously estimating, and in some cases even putting aside, the evidence of our oldest MSS. And if Tischendorf, in his last edition, has run into a fault on the side of speculative hypotheses as to the origin of readings found in those MSS., it must be confessed, that Tregelles has sometimes erred on the (certainly, far safer) side of scrupulous adherence to the mere literal evidence of the ancient MSS. I shall elsewhere try to shew, that to accept merely such literal evidence, is, in fact, to shut our eyes to very much of the real evidence which due study of the habits of the MSS., and consequent intelligent judgment on that literal testimony, might set before us^a.

16. Believing this, I cannot concur with Dr. Tregelles in his view of the conclusion to be arrived at from the evidence in many disputed places. My reasons will be stated at length in the subsequent paragraphs. Meantime I would beg my readers to carry away in their minds the impression, not of my dissent from Dr. Tregelles in regard to such passages, but of my thorough concurrence with his principles on the whole, and of my great value for his biblical labours, and for the spirit of painstaking and accuracy, and reverence, which every where distinguishes them. My personal obligations to him in the preparation of this edition will be acknowledged under their proper heads^b. No one among those interested in the elucidation of the sacred text can more heartily wish than I do, that he may have health and eyesight spared him to complete the important work which he has so faithfully and worthily begun.

^b See below, in the list of MSS.

17. It remains now that I should explain in detail the principles on which I have revised the text.

18. The text which I have adopted has been constructed by following in all ordinary cases the united or preponderating evidence of the most ancient authorities: in cases where the most ancient authorities do not agree nor preponderate, taking into account later evidence; and in cases where the weight of diplomatic testimony is interfered with by adventitious circumstances (such as parallelism or the like), applying those principles of criticism which appear to furnish sound criteria of a spurious or genuine reading. The object of course is, in each case, where evidence is divided, to mount up, if possible, to the original reading from which all the variations sprung: in other words, to discover some word, or some arrangement, which shall account for the variations, but for which none of the variations will account.

19. The carrying out of this primary object will lead to several critical maxims, more or less applicable under varying circumstances. These have been for the most part so well detailed long ago by Griesbach, that I shall need no apology for transferring to my pages his important paragraphs on the subject:—

1) Brevior lectio, nisi testium vetustorum et gravium auctoritate penitus destituatur, preferenda est verbosiori. Librarii enim multo proniores ad addendum fuerunt, quam ad omittendum. Consulto vix unquam prætermiserunt quicquam, addiderunt quam plurima: casu vero nonnulla quidem exciderunt, sed haud pauca etiam oculorum, aurium, memoriæ, phantasie ac iudicii errore a scribis admissa, adjecta sunt textui. In primis vero brevior lectio, etiamsi testium auctoritate inferior sit altera, præferenda est,

- a) si simul durior, obscurior, ambigua, elliptica, hebraizans aut solœca est,
- b) si eadem res variis phrasibus in diversis codicibus expressa legitur,
- c) si vocabulorum ordo inconstans est et instabilis,
- d) in pericoparum¹ initiis,
- e) si plenior lectio glossam seu interpretamentum sapit, vel parallelis locis ad verbum consonat, vel e lectionariis immigrasse videtur.

Contra vero plenior lectionem breviori (nisi hanc multi et insignes tueantur testes) anteponimus,

- a) si omissioni occasionem præbere potuerit ὁμοιωτέλεων,
- b) si id quod omissum est, librariis videri potuit obscurum,

¹ In the beginnings of the ecclesiastical portions we often find a word or a clause supplied,—the proper name of the agent or speaker, or the like.

durum, superfluum, insolens, paradoxum, pias aures offendens, erroneum, aut locis parallelis repugnans,

γ) si ea quæ absunt, salvo sensu salvaue verborum structura abesse poterant, e quo genere sunt propositiones, quod vocant, incidentes, præsertim breviores, et alia, quorum defectum librarius relegens quæ scripserat haud facile animadvertibat,

δ) si * brevior lectio ingenio, stylo aut scopo auctoris minus conveniens est,

ε) si * sensu prorsus caret,

ζ) si e locis parallelis aut e lectionariis eam irrepsisse probabile est.

2) Difficilior et obscurior lectio anteponenda est ei, in qua omnia tam plana sunt et extricata, ut librarius quisque facile intelligere ea potuerit. Obscuritate vero et difficultate sua esse potissimum indoctos librariorum vexarunt lectiones,

a) quarum sensus absque penitioris græcismi, hebraismi, historisæ, archæologiæ, &c. cognitione perspicui non facile poterant,

b) quibus admissis vel sententia, varii generis difficultatibus obstructa, verbis inesse, vel aptus membrorum orationis nexus dissolvi, vel argumentorum ab auctore ad confirmandam suam thesin prolatorum nervus incidi videbatur.

3) Durior lectio præferatur ei, qua posita, oratio suaviter leniterque fluit. Durior autem est lectio elliptica, hebraizans, solæca, a loquendi usu græcis consuetudo abhorrens aut verborum sono aures offendens.

4) Insolentior lectio potior est ea, qua nil insoliti continetur. Vocabula ergo rariora, aut hac saltem significatione, quæ eo de quo quæritur loco admittenda esset, rarius usurpata, phrasesque ac verborum constructiones usu minus tritæ, præferantur vulgatiore. Pro exquisitiore enim librarii usitata cupide arripere, et in illorum locum glossemata et interpretamenta (præsertim si margo aut loca parallela talia suppeditarent) substituere soliti sunt.

5) Locutiones minus emphaticæ, nisi contextus et auctoris scopus emphasin postulent ³, propius ad genuinam scripturam accedunt, quam discrepantes ab ipsis lectiones quibus major vis inest aut inesse videtur. Erudituli enim librarii ⁴, ut commentatores, emphases amabant ac captabant.

³ But it is evident that this exception requires the utmost caution in its application.

⁴ Librarios enim dicimus, et hic et alibi criticos simul ac codicum possessores intelligi volumus, qui in suis libris, e quibus alii deinceps exscripti sunt, vel ipsum textum

- 6) Lectio, præ aliis sensum pietati (præsertim monasticæ) *alendæ aptum fundens, suspecta est*⁵.
- 7) Præferatur aliis lectio cui sensus subest apparenter quidem falsus, qui vero re penitus examinata verus esse deprehenditur.
- 8) Inter plures unius loci lectiones ea pro suspecta merito habetur, quæ orthodoxorum dogmatibus manifeste præ cæteris facit. Cum enim codices hodie superstites plerique, ne dicam omnes, exarati sint a monachis aliisque hominibus catholicorum partibus addictis, credibile non est, hos lectionem in codice, quem quisque exscriberet, obviam neglexisse ullam, qua catholicorum dogma aliquod luculenter confirmari aut hæresis fortiter jugulari posse videretur. Scimus enim, lectiones quasunque, etiam manifesto falsas, dummodo orthodoxorum placitis patrocinentur, inde a tertiæ sæculi initiis mordicus defensas seduloque propagatas, cæteras autem ejusdem loci lectiones, quæ dogmati ecclesiastico nil præsidii afferrent hæreticorum perfidiæ attributas temere fuisse⁶.
- 9) Cum scribæ proclives sint ad iterandas alieno loco vocabulorum et sententiarum terminationes easdem, quas modo scripsissent aut mox scribendas esse, præcurrentibus calamum oculis, præviderent, *lectiones ex ejusmodi rhythmici fallacia facillime explicandæ, nullius sunt pretii*⁷.
- 10) Hisce ad peccandum illecebris similes sunt aliæ. Librarii, qui sententiam, antequam scribere eam inciperent, totam jam perlegissent, vel dum scriberent fugitivo oculo exemplum sibi propositum inspicerent, sæpe ex antecedentibus vel consequentibus literam, syllabam aut immutarunt, vel margini saltem qualescunque suas animadversiones et emendationes illeaverunt. (not. Griesb.)

⁶ This rule, sound in the main (and hardly to be cited, as Scrivener, p. 375, would wish me to do, without its concluding sentence), must be applied with the following discrimination:—If the passage is of such a nature, that, whichever reading is adopted, the orthodox meaning is legitimate, but the adoption of the stronger orthodox reading is absolutely incompatible with the heretical meaning,—then it is probable that such stronger orthodox reading was the original. For while the heretics would be certain to annul the expression offensive to them and substitute the weaker one, the orthodox, on the above hypothesis, would have originally no motive for alteration.—A case in point is the celebrated τῇ ἐκκλησίᾳ τοῦ θεοῦ, Acts xx. 28. Had θεοῦ been the original, it would have been certain to be altered by the heretics: had κρίσις been the original, no reason can be assigned why the orthodox should have tampered with it. It is probable therefore, as far as this consideration is involved (see note in loc.), that θεοῦ was the original word.

⁷ See a curious instance, among many others, of mechanical repetition of a phrase from association, 1 Cor. xiv. 18: and Rom. viii. 1.

vocabulum perperam arripuerunt, novasque sic lectiones procuderunt. Si v. c. duo vocabula vicina ab eadem syllaba vel litera inciperent, accidit haud raro, ut vel prius plane omitteretur, vel posteriori temere tribueretur, quod priori esset peculiare. Ejusmodi hallucinationes vix vitabit, qui libello paullo verbosiori exscribendo operam dat, nisi toto animo in hoc negotium incumbat: id quod pauci librarii fecisse videntur. Lectiones ergo, quæ ex hoc errorum fonte promanarunt, quantumvis vetustæ ac consequenter in complures libros transfusæ sint, recte rejiciuntur, præsertim si codices cæteroqui cognati ab hujus labis contagio puri deprehendantur¹.

- 11) E pluribus ejusdem loci lectionibus ea præstat, quæ velut media inter cæteras interjacet; hoc est ea, quæ reliquarum omnium quasi stamina ita continet, ut, hac tanquam primitiva admissa, facile appareat, quam ratione, seu potius quonam erroris genere, ex ipsa cæteræ omnes propullularint.
- 12) Repudiantur lectiones glossam seu interpretamentum redolentes, cujus generis interpolationes nullo negotio emunctioris naris criticus luteolfaciet.
- 13) Rejiciendas esse lectiones, e Patrum commentariis aut scholiis vetustis in textum invectas, magno consensu critici docent. (He proceeds at some length to caution against the promiscuous assumption of such corruptions in the earlier codices and versions from such sources.)
- 14) Respuimus lectiones ortas primum in lectionariis, quæ sæpissime in anagnosmatum initiis ac interdum in clausulis etiam atque in medio contextu claritatis causa addunt, quod ex orationis serie supplendum esset, resecantque vel immutant, quod, sejunctum ab antecedentibus aut consequentibus, vix satis recte intelligi posse videretur. (Similar cautions are here added against assuming this too promiscuously.)
- 15) Damnandæ sunt lectiones e latina versione in græcos libros invectæ. (Cautions are here also inserted against the practice of the earlier critics, who if they found in the græco-latin MSS. or even in those of high antiquity and value, a solitary reading agreeing with the Latin, hastily condemned that codex as latinizing.)

¹ The vast number and extent of mistakes of this kind are only known to those who have carefully observed the phenomena of the later and usually less regarded mss. There is hardly an opportunity presented by similar endings of words, of which the fertile genius of error has not availed itself. And even in our most ancient MSS., these occur not unfrequently. A remarkable instance is found in A, 1 Cor. vi. 2—6, where because ἐλαχίστων ends ver. 2, and ἐπὶ τῶν ends ver. 6, the whole lying between is omitted, the transcriber's eye having passed on from the first -ιστων to the second; and another in B, Matt. xii. 46—48, where the whole ver. 47 is omitted between λαλήσαι and λαλήσαι.

20. Having reprinted for the use of students these excellent rules of Griesbach's, I must be contented to refer for their ampler illustration to the prefaces of his and other editions, especially that of the 7th Leipzig edition of Tischendorf, pp. xxvii ff.

21. It is mainly in accordance with these rules that my text has been arranged. Every various reading has been judged with reference to external MSS. authority and internal probability combined,—and that reading adopted, which on the whole seemed most likely to have stood in the original text. Such judgments are of course open to be questioned, and in many cases the reading will perhaps never be completely agreed on; but I do not know that this should deter successive editors from using all means in their power to arrive at a decision in each case, and conscientiously discharging their duty by the sacred text*.

22. The reader will expect to find a statement, how far, in this Fifth Edition of the present volume, I have remained firm to the principles enunciated in the previous ones, and how far increasing experience, and the labours of others, have modified the manner in which I have aimed at reaching the end above enounced.

23. The tendency of any change which time has brought about in my critical views, may be described as twofold: both branches being consistent and concurrent.

24. FIRST, I have become disposed, as research and comparison have gone on, to lay more and more weight on the evidence of our few most ancient MSS. and versions, and less on that (in its present state at least) of the great array of later mss. which are so often paraded in digests as supporting or impugning the commonly received text.

25. It is but due from me to render a reason for an assertion apparently so much at variance with some passages in the prolegomena to the Second Edition of this vol., and in the prolegg. to the former editions of Vol. II.

I am still willing to endorse what was said there, Vol. II. p. 59, par. 5 (3rd edition).

“With regard to MSS. testimony, it has been my endeavour to combine, as far as possible, that furnished by the later MSS. with that of the more ancient, and to give them, as well as the others, due weight in the determination of readings. The great thing required, in weighing the testimony of MSS., is a knowledge of the habits of various classes of correctors and transcribers. Long before the date of our earliest MS.,

* In this part of my work I have found of especial service the critical notices prefixed to each chapter in Meyer's Commentary, and the similar discussions of readings in the text of that of De Wette: and have consulted whatever else I have been able to find on the more important and celebrated varieties of reading.

a systematic course of correction had begun, and there existed errors of transcription of considerable standing. The earlier those corrections or errors originated, the more extensively would they be spread among our present families of manuscripts, and the more likely are they to have found their way into the generally received text. Also, I need hardly say, the more difficult are they of detection. The only sure way to detect them, is by intimate acquaintance with the general phenomena of manuscripts, the cursive as well as the uncial. Such acquaintance will enable us at once to pronounce a reading to be spurious, which yet has a vast array of MS. authority in its favour: just because we know that it furnishes an instance of a correction or of an error commonly found in other places."

26. But it is in the very course of applying this in practice, that difficulties have sprung up, of a nature so formidable, as to produce in me an oscillation back towards the purely diplomatic principle, as after all the only trustworthy one under our present circumstances.

27. For let us consider, the remarks above cited being taken as substantially correct, how we are to proceed. We find a certain number of MSS. and versions respecting which our knowledge is definite and reliable: whose date we can determine within very narrow limits of deviation. So far, as to external evidence, we are safe. We cannot arrive by their means at the original sacred text, for the reasons stated in the paragraph above quoted: viz. because, before they were written and made, a course of correction, and a series of mistakes in transcribing, had taken place: but we can arrive at a result of which we know the value: we can ascertain, in the main, what was the text of the times to which that body of evidence belongs: and we can then, under safe caution, apply to that text the above canons of subjective criticism: of which application I shall speak by and by. We now come to the great mass of cursive mss., written in later ages. What is stated above, that some of these possibly may be transcripts of texts of at least as much value as those of our more ancient MSS., hardly admits of a doubt: and in some few cases it has been ascertained that it is so. But in the great majority of cases, where are we now, as to definiteness of evidence? What do we know of the character of the texts which we are citing? Even supposing that our collations have been thoroughly made, as in the case of the mss. examined by Mr. Scrivener, how can we be sure that many of our witnesses ought not to be reduced to one, as being mere transcripts of one and the same text? Here all is uncertainty; all is vague, and liable to wide mistake. In this field it is, that the strong assertions may be safely made, which we so constantly find in the pages of those who would uphold the received text at all hazards: who tell us again and again that "four or five mss. only" read this or that, and "all the rest agree with the received text:" when perhaps those "four or five" are just the consensus of our most ancient and venerable authorities, and "all the rest" may, for aught we know, be in many cases no more worthy to be heard in the matter, than so many separate printed copies of the present day.

28. The tendency of these remarks has been to shew, that though there may yet lie hid, among the mass of cursive mss., texts of great value and of independent ancient origin, we must be contented to take, as our basis of revision of the sacred text, such ancient texts as can, at each period of revision, be definitely pointed out to us; and we must not assume at random that because the mass may contain more of such, therefore it is to be regarded as made up of them. Future researches will very probably bring to light more such trustworthy witnesses: as this happens, let them be admitted into our list, as has been already done in the case of the mss. 1, 83, 69, and some others. And let the existence of any remarkable readings be carefully noted in the other cursive mss., that their value and position may be by degrees ascertained. But it is high time that it should be acknowledged, with humility and ingenuousness, that we of this age, when sacred criticism is yet in its infancy, must be contented with a provisional text, founded on such data as are well assured and defined for us: and must leave it to other times, and more complete states of our manuscript evidence, to approximate closer and closer to what may be presumed to be our ultimate best text.

29. It is considerations such as these which have led me to banish from my digest the long processions of cursive mss. of which I have been speaking: and to base my revision only on those witnesses respecting which I am able to speak with something like certainty.

30. SECONDLY, experience has brought about some change in my convictions with regard to the application of canons of subjective criticism to the consensus of ancient MSS. In proportion as I have been led severely to examine, how far we can safely depend on such subjective considerations, I confess that the limits of their applicability have become narrowed. In very many cases, they may be made to tell with equal force either way. One critic adopts a reading because it is in accord with the usage of the sacred writer: another holds it, for this very reason, to have been a subsequent conformation of the text. One believes a particle to have been inserted to give completeness: another, to have been omitted as appearing superfluous.

Now doubtless the statement of such uncertainties as these will lead mere reviewers, and those who like them only skim the surface of the subject, to cast contempt on all application of subjective considerations. But such ought not to be its result, and will not be, on any critical mind.

The limits of such application will become narrowed: but by that very contraction it will become safer and more certain. It is manifest that we ought, in every case where it seems to be called for, to look at and weigh both sides: where the probabilities appear to be balanced, we are bound, in fair dealing with the sacred text, to leave on the mind of the critical reader the impression of that equilibrium, and for the general reader, who must be furnished with a text, to give the ancient witnesses the benefit of the doubt:—where the preponderance appears to us to be clear (a matter which I will presently illustrate) against the ancient MSS. and versions, we ought not to adhere stiffly and formally to diplomatic conformity, but boldly to reject them in this case, as we boldly follow them in others.

31. And as to this latter, I do not know that the difference between the principles of intelligent critics is very great. Certainly, as before remarked, Tischendorf, in his last edition, has committed himself to subjective speculations of a vague and untrustworthy kind: but they have been violations of his own principles. The difference with which I am mainly here concerned on this point, is that between the practice of Dr. Tregelles, and my own. In order to set this clearly before the reader, I will cite some of the principles which he has enounced in the Introductory Notice to his Greek Testament.

32. He says,

“(3.) If the reading of the ancient authorities in general is unanimous, there can be but little doubt that it should be followed, whatever may be the later testimonies: for it is most improbable that the independent testimony of early MSS., versions, and Fathers, should accord with regard to something entirely groundless.”

And,

“(6.) The readings respecting which a judgment must be formed, are those where the evidence is really divided in such a way, that it is needful to enquire on which side the balance preponderates. In such cases, it is not enough to enumerate authorities: they must be examined point by point. OTHER THINGS BEING EQUAL, (a) an early citation will sometimes be decisive, especially if it is given in express terms. (b) Also if one reading accords with a parallel passage and the other does not: (c) or if one introduces an amplification given elsewhere: (d) or if one seems to avoid a difficulty which the other does not: (e) or if there is one well-attested reading, and several others which may probably have been taken from it: (f) or if the one reading might be easily accounted for on principles connected with the known origin of variations: in such cases it is not difficult, on the whole, to form a judgment as to what was probably the original reading. It is quite true that at times it may be very doubtful whether the quantity of direct evidence may not overbalance all modes of procedure derived from the application of a principle, and as to which of two seemingly conflicting considerations ought to have most weight."

33. Now with the whole of these statements I accord in the main, and it is only on a certain portion of frontier ground, so to speak, that I have any difference with Dr. Tregelles: on that namely which lies between the cases described in these two paragraphs of his. Where ancient evidence is vastly preponderant in favour of some reading, but at the same time we have very strong reasons for suspecting that reading, it is in these cases, which I am bound to say very seldom occur, that I sometimes feel bound to go one way and Dr. Tregelles goes the other.

34. There is one element, implied perhaps in his case (f), but not explicitly stated, which in such cases deserves more weight than he has given to it. It is this: the known habits of early copyists, and of the particular MSS. with which we are dealing. All biblical critics know, that certain ways of writing, e. g. ai for ε and vice versa, η for ει, ει for ι, υ for ο, &c., prevail to such an extent as to form a subject for discrimination, entirely separate from that of various readings. One MS. reads εραψε, another εραπει: but we hardly as much as notice this at all¹. We call it itacism, the name by which such normal enormities are known: and no further notice is taken of it. Of these Tregelles himself says, Horne, vol. iv. p. 51, "Such interchanges as these are frequent even in the oldest MSS. extant: and their occurrence belongs rather to the head of orthography than to that of various readings in the proper sense of the term. In general, they may and ought to pass unnoticed: but when they happen to form an actual word it may require some consideration to determine what was the word intended. . . . The sense and meaning must determine: for the spelling has no authority at all between εσται and εσρε, εξετε and εξεσαι, and similar words. Even if every MS. should agree in one spelling, there would be no liberty taken by any who read the other: since these vowels and diphthongs are used indiscriminately."

35. Now there are other variations in our ancient MSS., not quite of the same character, but very nearly approximating to it, which ought whenever they occur, to be taken cum grano salis, bearing in mind the entire uncertainty whether they ought really to be reckoned as various readings or not.

36. To give but one instance, that of the convertible use of the long and short vowels. A reads ζοηην for ζωηην Mark vi. 8; λαμβανωμεν for λαμβανομεν 1 John iii. 22: B reads εχωμεν for εχομεν Gal. vi. 10: C reads ζησωμεν for ζησομεν Rom. vi. 2, and συζησωμεν for -ομεν ib. 8: D reads χειρων σχισμα γινεται Mark ii. 22: AB read διωκομεν for διωκωμεν Rom. xiv. 19: AC read ειςερχωμεθα for -ομεθα Heb. iv. 3: AD read προσενζωμαι twice for -ομαι in 1 Cor. xiv. 15. Dr. Tregelles attempts (Horne, ut supra) to clear the most ancient MSS. from the charge of this confusion: but in vain; they are amenable to it in common with, though not to such an extent as, the later ones.

37. With these facts before us we come to such a reading as the εχωμεν of Rom. v. 1. Here we have certainly not one or two ancient MSS., but the consensus of all, together with the oldest versions and Fathers. And I own to having been so far shaken in the trustworthiness of subjectivities, that in the last edition of my second volume, I have edited εχωμεν, as matter of strict duty. But I have felt, while doing so, that my confidence in it, as the original word of St. Paul, was very much diminished owing to the practice of the MSS. of interchanging ο and ω.

38. But let us descend from this almost irrefragable diplomatic ground to the far more common case, where perhaps first-rate evidence being but scanty to begin with, all that exists in the particular case presents just such a reading as the mistakes or corrections of copyists are constantly bringing before us: where, without that balance of evidence which Tregelles seems to require as the condition for the exercise of critical judgment, some one of his six considerations might in most minds carry conviction as to the original reading; are we to abstain, in such a case, from sitting in judgment on the reading, and on the authority of two, or even but one, of our early uncials, to carry into our text what we are all but sure is not part of it, or leave out of it that which we are nearly certain belongs to it?

39. The question which I have just asked applies to the majority of passages where my readings differ from those of Dr. Tregelles. It would lead us too far, in these prolegomena, to examine them one by one; but if the reader, who follows my text and digest, notes the passages where I have been led, not by the weight of ancient external testimony, but by some one of the above-stated principles which seems to me to establish the text in spite of it, he may be nearly sure that in those Tregelles and I diverge.

40. The principal matter in which our great MSS. are at fault in the three Gospels, is, the piecing one Gospel from another in parallel places. The observation of a close student of the text will not fail to convince him, without "assuming that in every passage where there is variety of reading, the probability that two Evangelists did not use the same words exceeds all other probabilities¹," that in even the earliest MSS. there has been constant tampering with the text of one Gospel to conform it to that of another. And surely, such being a patent fact, nothing can justify us in lending ourselves to sanction such a practice by adopting it in our text, nor ought we to follow the multitude, whether it be of moderns or of ancients, in thus doing evil; but, even with the possibility of mistake in judgment, to avoid the almost certainty of mistake in fact. These cases require a discrimination which we can hardly expect in any critic to be faultless: but I submit that they do peremptorily require it; and I cannot believe that it will be found entirely wanting to those who with the human appliances of study of the sacred text, and ripened caution, unite that spirit of conscientious reverence, without which all biblical labour is in vain.

41. It remains that I should say something of the principles of recension of the text enounced and defended by Mr. Scrivener, in his edition of the Codex Augiensis, and now more elaborately in his "Introduction to the Criticism of the N. T."

42. From what has preceded, it will be clearly seen that I cannot consent to the course which he would prescribe for us, that of seeking our readings from the later uncials, supported as they usually are by the mass of cursive mss.: for to this his practice really amounts, after all the explanation which he has given of it in the work last cited. Nor can I conceive a time when examinations of texts, whose character is now latent, should lead scholars to such a procedure. For what right have we to set virtually aside these two wonderful facts; First, the agreement in the main of our oldest uncials, at the distance of one or two centuries,—of which, owing probably to the results of persecution, we have no MS. remains,—with the citations of the primitive fathers, and with the earliest versions? I say, the agreement in the main: for Mr. Scrivener's instances of discrepancy² are in vain used by him to produce

¹ So Mr. Hort, in an able notice of Tischendorf and Tregelles in the Journal of Philology for March, 1858, expresses himself, charging us with making the assumption. But surely this is not quite fair. We do not assume this, all other things being equal; but we are led to conclude this to have been so in the particular case, other things being unequal. E.g. where one Gospel is undisputed in the use of some particular word or phrase, and where in the parallel place in the others this word or phrase is found as the reading of one or more (perhaps all that happen to be present, in case of defect of one or more) of our great MSS., against the concurrence of the later uncials. It is obvious that in such a case as this we make no assumption such as that with which Mr. Hort charges us.

43. Secondly, the very general concurrence of the character of text of our earliest MSS., versions, and Fathers, with that text which the soundest critical principles lead us to adopt. This surely invests the authority of those early witnesses with a claim upon us which can never be set aside: whereas on the other hand, the fact, that the character of the text generally received, depending as it does in the main on our later uncials and on the mass of the cursive mss., instances so much more frequently the violation of sound critical principles, does seem to me to detract from the weight of those later witnesses in a measure which no mere concurrence of numbers can ever fill up.

44. If this were reversed: if we found, the earlier we mounted up, the Gospels more conformed, instead of more divergent: easy readings abounding instead of difficult ones: if we found that the text at present received differed from that of the early ages in being more harsh, more apparently discrepant from itself, more difficult and startling: then indeed we should have good reason to cling pertinaciously to it, and to believe, in spite of history, that the vigilance of the church over the sacred word had been ever on the increase, at a period in her history when all her other graces were on the decline: then we should be compelled to take as truth the plaint of the old tragedian, *ἀνὰ ποταμῶν ἱερῶν χυποῦσαι παγὰι*⁵, and to accept for once the prodigy, that "the further from the source the clearer the stream." The fact that all this is undeniably the other way: that the process by which the present received text has been attained has been that of crumbling down salient points, softening irregularities, conforming differences, favouring prevalent doctrines⁶,—forms what will ever prove to me an insuperable

⁴ It would be impossible here to range over such a number of examples as would prove this to the reader. But Mr. Scrivener himself furnishes a comment which may at least tend to relax the stringency of his own conclusion from those which he adduces: "I am fully aware that in a field so wide as the criticism of the N. T., those who dexterously select their examples may prove just what they will." It is true he has avoided the imputation of "dexterous selection" in those now brought forward by him (Introd. &c. pp. 401, 2): but may not almost the same be said of any limited selection of examples as set against the great prevailing currents of MS. evidence? The dissidence of ancient testimony is, I own, more valuable to me than the concurrence of that which is later. The study of the various readings in parallel places in the gospels will, I should imagine, bring most minds to the same conclusion.

⁶ Mr. Scrivener says (Introd. p. 406), "I am sorry he should think it right to add, 'favouring prevalent doctrines.' Why should any one be backward in stating that which is a notorious fact?" Mr. S.'s two next pages are very instructive as to the barrier against accepting the principles so ably advocated by Mr. Scrivener.

45. Of course it will be inferred that still less can I accede to the principles of recension enounced by another school of critics, e. g. by a writer in a number of the British Quarterly. I need but mention these principles by way of illustrating by antagonism those which I believe more and more to be the only sound ones. They seem to be nearly as follows:

1. That the received text requires alteration in comparatively few passages.
2. That in making alterations, the earlier mss. should have much less authority yielded to them than critical editors have hitherto assigned.
3. That the context ought to have great weight in determining the true reading.
4. That ancient versions, fathers, and such known facts as corruption from parallel passages, should only be used in subordination to the mass of mss. and considerations derived from the context.

46. In fact, to dwell but on one point here put forward, the consideration of the "context" is the very last that should be allowed by a critic to be present in his mind as an element of his judgment. I do not say that in some extreme cases it may not have to be introduced, as perhaps (but I should now speak doubtfully even in this case) in Rom. v. 1, where there are so many confusing considerations arising from the habits of the mss.: but certainly we may say, that it is by this very consideration of the context, and of N. T. usage, that our deteriorated Textus receptus has in many instances arisen¹, and that the general difference in view between him and myself as regards the dissidence of ancient, and concurrence of later evidence. The challenge which he there throws out to me, to "illustrate the next edition of my text of the Gospels with a further accession of various readings from the best cursive codices," is one which I of all men should be most ready to accept, if, on the one hand, my digest were to be taken for more than a compendium of various readings: and if, on the other, I could find that the character of the text of the various cursives had been sufficiently studied to be accurately ascertained.

¹ See two notable instances of these combined, 1) in a note of Dr. Bloomfield's, quoted with approbation by Dr. Wordsworth on John vi. 69—where the ancient reading ἄγιος is rejected by both, because the expression ἄγιος τοῦ θεοῦ does not elsewhere occur except in the confession of the dæmoniaca, and χριστός, ὁ υἱός τοῦ θεοῦ frequently occurs in the N. T. (!) A purer piece of arbitrary subjectivity can hardly be imagined. And 2) Dr. Wordsworth's own note immediately following, in which he retains τοῦ ζῶντος in the text, against BCDL (A being deficient, which he does not state) 1. 33, all the old latin versions except f, the vulg. copt. arm. Cyr. al., as being "very expressive and relevant to this place in connexion with ῥήματα ζῶντος, ver. 68." adoption of it as a critical gnomon would be the worst imaginable retrograde step in sacred criticism.

47. I am very anxious, in concluding this section, not to leave the impression on the reader that my present text differs from the former ones, or from those of Tischendorf and Tregelles, more than is really the case. In fact, with regard to the principles which regulate the decision in by far the greater number of differing readings, we are all in accord. It is but seldom, in most parts of the N. T., that those passages occur where our reasons of divergence come into play. And the same caution should be carried yet further. When it is objected by such writers as the critic in the British Quarterly, that "the texts in the modern critical editions are not even substantially the same," let the reader not hastily take this for granted, but carefully examine for himself how far it is true. He will find, that while in some passages differing views as to the comparative value of mere diplomatic evidence and of subjective considerations have led modern critical editors to different results, in the great mass of cases they are in accord. And let him hence learn to estimate the real gain which has accrued to our knowledge of the sacred text from that modern criticism which it is now becoming the fashion to despise: the positive progress which has been made in all those places where the ancient MSS. are unanimous against our received text: and the more satisfactory state of our knowledge by means of more collations, and the exercise of critical judgment, even in those places where the true reading is, and perhaps must ever remain, a matter of doubt.

48. It now remains to give a brief account of the method of spelling adopted in the text which I have edited. It has been taken, like the text itself, from the testimony of our most ancient existing MSS.

The following table is intended to bring into one view the main outlines of the course pursued in this volume, and to aid in freeing the digest as far as possible from all purely orthographical details:—

ἀλεις, Mk i. 16, 17, AB¹. [But ἀλεις retained in Mt iv. 18, 19 (αλεις B¹, αλεις C) and Lu v. 2 (αλεις ACQ^N). In Mk i., C is defective; N has αλεις ver 16, αλεις ver 17.]

ἀλλ' for ἀλλά (or vice versa). Whenever weighty testimony necessitates a change in the ordinary text, the chief witnesses for the form adopted are given as briefly as possible in the digest ad loc. Similarly with all other cases of elision or non-elision.

ἀνάγινον ABCD. (Mk xiv. 15; Lu xxii. 12.)

ἀνάπαυες ADR. (Lu xiv. 18, 21: B¹ has the two forms.)

ἀντιπέρα ABDR^N. (Lu viii. 26.)

ἀποκτείνων AC, and sometimes DN.

βαθίως ABCD. (Lu xxiv. 1.)

βαλλάντιον ABD, supported also by CQT².

Βουαρργός ABC. (Mk iii. 17.)

Βοός, Lu iii. 32, ABD and C(def in La) Mt. But we read Βοός with BN in Mt i. 5.

γίνημα ABCD. [Compare under 'Ιωάναν below. Similarly ρ for ρρ, e.g. ἐπιμμένοι BCM, Mt ix. 36; ἐπάπισαν ABCDZ, Mt xxvi. 27; προεῖρηξεν (not edited) BDN, Lu vi. 48; and B has παρησις Mk vii. 32, διαρήξας Mk xiv. 68, et similia.]

Γεθσημανεῖ (-ου) ABCD. (Mt xxvi. 36; Mk xiv. 32.)

Δαυιδ ABCDN. So also LTΞ of gosp., E of Acta, and (always) D of Epistles. The abbreviated form δαδ is exclusively used in FKNPQRUXZΓΑ 83. 69; it is also found in ACEGHLMAΞN 1, E of Acta, F of Epistles. The word is found at full length in BD always; in A, Lu iii. 31; in C, Heb iv. 7; in N, Mt i. 6. See Tregelles' digest on Lu iii. 31, from which this is partly taken. Δαυιδ is read in B¹EMVΓΑ, and in F of Epistles; but Δαυιδ is supported by overwhelming MS. authority and is the form adopted by Lachmann, Tischdf., Tregelles, and Westcott.

ἰδένω and ἡδένω. The best MSS. have the one almost as often as the other. When a consensus of MSS. leads to a form different from that found in the textus receptus the authority for our text is given in the digest.

[-α- and -ι-. See under Ανεῖ.]

ἐλκεμένος ABDP, Lu xvi. 20. [Cf. ἀνάκιρος.]

ἐκατοντάρχης BC, Mt viii. 18. (AD defective.) But ἐκατόνταρχος Mt viii. 5, 8 (read by BC notwithstanding the -χθ in ver 18); xxvii. 54 (-χης D); Lu vii. 6 (-χης BL); xxiii. 47 (-χης B).

Ἐλισαῖος ABD, Lu iv. 27. [Cf. γίνημα, above.]

ἐνατος ABCD. But in Mt xxvii. 46 D has εννατ., in ver 46 ενατ. [ἰνενήκοντα is also read in BD. Cf. γίνημα.]

ἐνεα BZ, Mt xix. 5. But elsewhere in gosp. ἔνεκεν is retained. Except Lu vi. 22, where all agree in ἐνεκα; and ἐνεκεν Lu iv. 18, in which the uncials agree. [B has ενεκα in Mt v. 10, 11; Mk xiii. 9; D, in Mk x. 29; Lu xxi. 12. B has ενεκεν Lu xviii. 29.]

ἐνροφήνευσα BDN, and sometimes A.

ἐραυνῶν B¹N Joh v. 39 al.

ἐρρήθη BD. (AC defective in Mt v. 21, 27, 31, 33, 38, 43.) In Rom ix. 12, 26, AB¹ have ἐρρήθη, and so also Cod. Clarom. 1. m.

ἐσθεν BN in Mk i. 6; BD in Lu vii. 38, x. 7, xxii. 80. In other places ἐσθεν as rec.

εἰδόκησα and ἡεἰδόκησα; εἰλόγησα and ἡεἰλόγησα; εὗρισκον and ἡεὗρισκον; et similia treated as ἰδένω and ἡδένω q. v.

εἰθέε, BC every where in Mk (except i. 18; where, however, LN have εἰθέε).

ἐχθός, Joh iv. 52, ABCDN.

ἐράτου, Mt xv. 23, BCDN. [So also CN in Mk iv. 10, where ABD and the text have -των.]

Ἰερουσαλμα, Mk xi. 1, BCD. This is the form used in all other places in Mt, Mk, and John (gosp.), except Mt xxiii. 37, where there is clearly special reason for the Hebrew form found alike in the ancient MSS. and in the ordinary text.

Ἰερουσαλήμ, Lu xviii. 8, BDR. This is the form found in all places in Lu (gosp.) except ii. 22, xix. 28 (Ἰερουσαλημ D), xxiii. 37.

Ἰωάναν (for Ἰωαννά) AB, Lu iii. 27 (C defective, D has a different genealogy). Similarly B generally reads Ἰωάνης, which Tregelles has edited. But B has Ἰωάννης Lu i. 60, 63; Acts iv. 6, 18, 19, where Vercellone states expressly, "ita cod. cum duplici v." In the other great MSS. the double ν holds its ground.

κάγω, κάμοι, κάμει, κάν, κάκει, κάκειθεν, κάκεινος, or their respective uncontracted forms, edited according to the preponderance of the early testimony briefly given in the digest. Variation only noticed when this consensus differs from the textus receptus.

Καφαρναούμ BDZN. [The received Καπερ. is found in ACP.]

κράβαττος ABCD. [B¹(Verc) has κραββυττος in Mk ii. 9, 11, 12, and only there; κραβαττος in ver 4; also in Mk vi., Joh v. &c. In Joh v., N has κραβακτον (sic).]

λεγιών BDN. So also C in Mk v. 9, but in v. 15 -ε-; -ε- has been retained in this edition in Mk xxvi. 53, Lu viii. 30. λεγειων is the form in D Mt xxvi. 53, and in B¹ Lu viii. 30: in both these MSS. ε and ι are constantly confounded; this is therefore equivalent to λεγιών, as λεγαίων D² (Lu viii. 30) is to λεγεών.

Λευεί AB, Lu iii. 29. Similarly Λευεί Heb vii. 5 (BCD¹N); Λευείς Heb vii. 9 (BC¹). Lu v. 27 (ABCD¹R²), Lu v. 29 (ABCR²); Λευείτης Lu x. 32 (BD), Joh i. 19 (BN); Λευειτικός Heb vii. 11 (BDN). In all places B has -ει-, but as it is certainly a special characteristic of B to substitute ε for ι (e. g. γεινομαι, γεινωσκω, κρινω, μισω, τιμω), it has not been followed in Λευει or Λευείς (except when further supported, as above), Ηλείας, Ιερειχω, Γαλιλαια, Ελειαβαθ. It is fair to remark that ε is not invariably found in B, e. g. κρινω is spelt with ι; κρινω, with ε: we find also (and have edited) Έξαιτίας, Ζαχαρίας, Άβιδ, Ίερεμίας, Ίεχονίας, Λυσανίας. The tendency in C was rather to substitute ι for ε; but in Mt xxviii. 3, we have ventured to reject ειδεα though supported by ABCD, and in Mk i. 5 Ιεροσολυμνται (ABD). There is no doubt that some names should be written with ε which it has been customary to spell with ι, but about many others there is an uncertainty which it has been thought best that the text of this edition should reflect. The following names, occurring for the most part in the genealogies of Mt i. and Lu iii. have been edited with -ει-:—Άμναιδεβ B (Mt i. 4 D defective) D (Lu iii. 33, an omission in B), Έσθαι AB, Έλσι AB, Ίουσις BD, Μελχι AB, Νησι AB, Νινευίται ABC(D) in Mt xii. 41 (but Νινευίται Lu xi. 30, with AC against B, D omitting the ver), Όξίας BD, Χωραζειν ABC².

λήμψομαι ABCDNQRTN. So also in all compounds. Similarly ἀνέλημψις ABCD (Lu ix. 51), λήμψις ABD¹ (Phil iv. 15, C defective).

Μαριάμ and Μαρία. The leading MSS. do not seem to be uniform in their practice. All agree in Μαριάμ Lu i. 27, and in making the genitive case Μαρίας (it occurs 7 times). In the dative, there is no reason to depart from the received reading Μαριάμ Lu ii. 5 (D alone reading Μαρία), Μαρία τῇ Μαγδ. Mk xvi. 9 (C has Μαριάμ). In the accusative, there is sufficient authority throughout the gospels for editing Μαριάμ; rejecting the received Μαρίαν in Joh xi., on the authority of BC: but Μαρίαν is read in B Mt i. 20; in D, Lu ii. 16; and in ABC, Rom xvi. 6. [For variations between μ and ν, compare Ίωανν and Καϊν (Lu iii. 30, 36) where μ has been edited with BN: similarly in ver. 27 for Ίωανν, Ίωανν is read in N.]

Μαθθαίος B¹D and, in Mt ix. 9, Lu vi. 15, N. This form has been adopted by Lachmann, Tischdf., and Tregelles. The received Μαθ. is supported by AC &c., and, in Mk iii. 18, by N. Similarly Μαθθάν (Mt i.) and Μαθθάν in Lu iii. 29, but Μαθθάν (so even B, Verc) in Lu iii. 24.

μαχείρη, Mt xxvi. 52 (ABC), Lu xxii. 49 (B¹DT). Similarly πλημμέρης BZN (Lu vi. 48).

Μωϋσής BD and, at least sometimes, RZN; so also occasionally A (Rev xv. 3) C (Heb iii. 2, 5). In the dative Μωυσει is the form generally found in BDN, but B¹ has -ση in Mk ix. 4. The accusative occurs only once in the gospels (Lu xvi. 29), and there all the uncials agree in the received termination -σα. In the Acts and epistles (4 places), however, there seems to be a similar agreement in favour of -σην.

ν ἐπελευστικόν uniformly added notwithstanding occasional exceptions in the MSS. we follow.

Ναζαρεθ, Ναζαρέτ, and Ναζαρά. Some of the second and third-rate uncials have adopted one form throughout: thus L always has Ναζαρετ; and H^MUVA, Ναζαρεθ. But in our earliest and best MSS. we find no such artificial uniformity. A has Ναζαρετ 4 times, Ναζαρεθ twice, and Ναζαρετ 3 times; B, Ναζαρετ 6 times (besides 8 times secunda manu), Ναζαρεθ 4 times, and Ναζαρεν once; C, Ναζαρεθ 3 times, and Ναζαρεθ 4 times; X, Ναζαρετ, Ναζαρεθ, and Ναζαρεν, each once; D, however, has Ναζαρεθ 7 times, Ναζαρετ and Ναζαρεν each once. We have then four or five forms, each of which has strong claims to be considered as the ancient or even the original reading in one or other of the twelve passages in which the word occurs. In Acts x. 38 and Mt xxi. 11 we have no difficulty in adopting Ναζαρεθ: in the former case on the authority of BCDE against AGH, and in the latter on that of BCDX &c. against FGLF. With as little hesitation we are bound to accept Ναζαρετ in Joh i. 46, 47, with ABLX against EFGH^MUVA. In Mt iv. 13, a third form, Ναζαρά, establishes itself on the authority of B'Z 33 Orig, supported as they are by X in Lu iv. 16, lat-e in Joh i. 46, and Eus (teste Scholz) in Mt ii. 23: see also Griesbach's fourth Canon. In Lu ii. 39, 51, the agreement of B' with D &c., confirmed in ver. 39 by X, establishes the form Ναζαρεθ. The five remaining cases admit of considerable doubt, and in fact it is almost impossible to come to any steady decision upon them: for in Mt ii. 23, Ναζαρεθ is supported by C &c., Ναζαρετ being the reading of B(sic) DL; in Mk i. 9 Ναζαρετ is supported by BLTA, Ναζαρετ by AP, and Ναζαρεθ by DFHKMUV; in Lu i. 26, we have B for Ναζαρετ, C for Ναζαρεθ, and A for Ναζαρεν; in Lu ii. 4 Ναζαρετ is supported by BEKLX, Ναζαρεθ by DFGHMUFA, and Ναζαρεν by ACA; lastly, in Lu iv. 16, we have every variety, and little or nothing to guide our decision; for though we read Ναζαρετ with BKL, yet A has Ναζαρεν; EFGHMUVFA, Ναζαρεθ; Δ, Ναζαρεν; D, Ναζαρεν; and X, Ναζαρεν. [We may mention here that Γεννησαρετ, though it only occurs three times, and then with preponderating authority for the usual form, is still, in one or two uncial MSS, varied in a manner similar to Ναζαρετ. Thus we find γεννησαρεθ, γεννησαρεν, and even (in D') γεννησαρ.]

Ναζαρέν ABC(D), Lu iv. 27.

οἶτος before a consonant, edited uniformly. So, but with occasional exceptions, ABCDN &c.

παρεδοί e. g. Mk iv. 29 BDN. Similarly γνοι e. g. Mk v. 43 ABD.

πῶν BCD(N), Joh iv. 7, 9, 10. [N has πιν, so A ver. 9.]

πρεθε BCDN. Similarly πρεθης in the Epistles.

ραββαί ABCD, Mk xiv. 45. But ραββί retained in all other places, though in most, if not all, B^N read ραββι.

ραββουρί ABC and all other uncials (Mk x. 51 and [rec also] John xx. 16). [B has -ρι.]

Σολομώνες ABDEN and sometimes C. Similarly Σολομῶνα.

συνεπυλάτορα AB(D) &c. (Mk vi. 27, C defective.)

συνζητεῖν ABCD. Adopted by Lachmann, Tischendorf, and Tregelles. [This is clearly a distinct case from the following, where in spite of the best MSS. the ordinary form has been retained. Ἰνκατεῖν ABDQ (Lu xviii. 1, C defective); παλιγγενεσία BCDZ Mt xix. 28; συνεαθησθαι ABCP (Mk xiv. 54, var. lect. in D); συνκαλεῖν ABCD; συνλαλεῖν BD and, twice, C (συλλ. A and, once, C); συνμαθητης ACDN (Joh^xi. 16 : συνμ. B[Verc]); συλλαμβάνειν holds its ground in B : in ed. Verc. συλλ. is read 11 times, συνλ. only once (Phil iv. 3). The same is the case with συλλίγειν : συλλ. all 7 times in B (συνλ. D in Mt xiii. at least.)

συνλειτουργία BCD (Mk iii. 5).

συνπαράγειν ABCDPQR (Lu xxiii. 48).

συνπνίγειν ABCD. [Corrige Mk iv. 19.]

συνπορεύειν ABC. (Mk x. 1, var. lect. in D.)

συνσταυρῶν ABN. (Mt xxvii. 44 [C def., D var. lect.], Joh xix. 32 [CD def.].)

ταμίον BD Mt vi. 6. [All agree in this form in the 3 other passages.]

τεσσαράκοντα AB¹CPN. (C contains only one of the 4 places [Mt. iv. 2] in the gospels in which the word is found.) But τεσσαρες in B throughout the gospels; τεσσαρες in N (Joh xi. 17; xix. 23); τεσσαρ. 5 times in A, τεσσαρα once (Joh xix. 23). So also καθηρισθη has been edited in Mk i. 42 with A B¹(sic) C; but καθαρισθη in the 7 other places, in 6 of which B has -θαρ-, in Mt viii. 3 -θιρ-, l. m.

χραιοφιλότης ABDI, PRZ. (Lu vii. 41; xvi. 5. C defective in both.)

49. The conflicting claims of δν and δν have in general more the character of various readings than of mere orthographical variations. But the habit of B and many other MSS., and also of the printed text from the textus receptus to that of the present volume, brings before us many cases in which δν must be looked upon merely as a popular corruption for δν. The following is a list of certain of these, compiled by Kuenen and Cobet (N. T. ad fidem Cod. Vat. Praef. p. lxxiii), in which B has αν. Mt. v. 19 (once); xi. 27; xii. 32 (once); xv. 5; xvi. 19 (once), 25*; xviii. 5, 18 (once), 19; xx. 4; xxii. 9*; xxiv. 28; xxvi. 13; Mk iii. 28*; vi. 10; viii. 35 (once); x. 35; xiii. 11; xiv. 9; Lu. vii. 23; ix. 57; xvii. 33; Acts ii. 21*; viii. 19. On looking out these places in critical editions, we find that in every one of them D has αν. In those marked with an asterisk the text of this edition differs from the received. In the rest, the received, as well as our text, has the form found in B. Three other instances in the Gospels and Acts are included in Cobet's list, these are:—Mt viii. 19, where, D being deficient, there seems to be no important variation from the reading δν; Lu ix. 48, where it is doubtful which reading is really found in B (the Bentley collation contradicting the two Roman editions); and Lu x. 35, which we have separated because it is the only one of the list in which B stands alone, and in which we have retained the reading not found in that MS.

50. One other matter, referred in the digest to the prolegomena, must be treated of here. We have to decide in some way or other between the readings Γαδαρηνων, Γερασσηνων, and Γεργεσηνων in the parallel passages of the three synoptical evangelists (Mt viii. 28; Mk v. 1; Lu viii. 26, 37). There being strong ancient evidence for each of these words, and each occurring in all three gospels, how are we to find out which of them belongs properly to any one of the three? The ancient versions are here of little assistance: for Syr syr-txt uniformly adopt Γαδαρηνων; latt, Γερασσηνων; copt æth arm, Γεργεσηνων. We have endeavoured then to assign the proper reading to each Gospel by weighing MS. against MS. in the light of the principle called 'corruption from parallel passages.' In St. Matthew, we have BC' for Γαδαρηνων; against D for Γερασσηνων (A being here defective), and we therefore adopt Γαδαρηνω. Again in St. Luke, we have Γερασσηνων, supported by BC'D; against Γαδαρηνων, which is the reading of A; we therefore place Γερασσηνω in the text of St. Luke. Lastly, in St. Mark's Gospel, we find that BD are arrayed against AC; the former supporting Γερασσηνων, which we have already accepted as St. Luke's word, the latter supporting Γαδαρηνων, which seems to be the right reading in St. Matthew. What is to be done in this division of the best MSS., joined as it is to the high probability that there has been corruption in C from || Mt, in BD from || Lu? At this juncture, the second-rate MSS. come to our aid, supported by other considerations of importance: Δ reads Γαδαρηνων in St. Matt., Γαδαρηνων in St. Luke, but Γεργεσηνων in St. Mark; U deserts the class with which it is usually found, to support the same reading, which is moreover the only one found in the three places in L 1. 33 copt æth arm, is the reading of PÆ in St. Luke (the only one of the three passages in which they are extant), of X elsewhere, of Epiphanius, of ev-y, and (though in other places it has Γερασσηνων) of the margin of the later Syriac.

51. The punctuation of the text in this and my other editions has been revised on the principle which as far as I know Lachmann was the first to apply to the N. T., viz. the dropping of commas wherever they were unnecessary, i. e. wherever the sense of itself sufficiently indicates the break: and the frequent substitution of commas or periods for the colons so plentifully scattered in the received text: of commas, where the sense flows on, and the colon hindered it: of periods, where the sense is entirely broken, and the colon seemed to connect it. Almost all printed books are sadly over-punctuated. There is no greater hindrance to the flow and connexion of thought in the mind of a reader than that festooning off words and clauses by commas, of which our modern typographers are so fond. And if the getting rid of them is desirable in other books, it becomes a duty in our treatment of the sacred text. All stops in it are purely human inventions: and though some are absolutely necessary for the guidance of the general reader, they should be as few as possible and only those positively required. Among other services which modern criticism has rendered to the sacred text, this, though it may seem one of the least, is no mean one, that it has cleared it from the exegetical obscurations of many thousand commas.

SECTION II.

OF THE VARIOUS READINGS.

1. The digest of various readings in the fourth edition of this volume was entirely re-written. In the present edition the whole has been carefully revised and the processes mentioned in the next paragraph carried out more thoroughly and consistently than in the previous edition. This labour has been undertaken and carried through, under my own superintendence, by the Rev. A. W. Grafton.

2. The particulars in which these editions differ from their predecessors may be thus stated:

a) The weeding out of matter untrustworthy, or irrelevant, or not properly belonging to a work whose main purpose is philological and exegetical.

β) The insertion of valuable additional matter which has chiefly accrued by the labours of collators during the years 1856—April, 1863.

3. With reference to the former of these, I may remark that experience has shewn great numbers of the cursive MSS. commonly cited for or against readings in the sacred text, to be evidence of the most uncertain and questionable kind. Their readings have been very imperfectly collated: their individual character is little known: the impression given by a long array of them on one side is most fallacious, for we know not whether an equally long array might not be mustered on the other, had they been more thoroughly collated. This remark applies to very many readings which are commonly supposed to rest on the almost unanimous testimony of the later MSS. The whole reasoning founded on them has been loose and baseless. We know not the stability of our ground.

4. It seemed therefore in re-arranging the digest for the fourth edition, that it would be best to banish from it all uncertain and ill-assured evidence, and to construct our text out of that only, on which we could entirely depend. The abbreviations “*al.*₂₀ Scholz,” “*al.*₃₀ Tischendorf,” and the like, no longer appear, since, in our entire ignorance of any definite particulars, such statements tend only to mislead. A summary of the evidence of the cursive MSS. is given in passages where they have been really examined. We have been able to place on our margin and cite systematically three of the most important and most thoroughly collated of the cursive MSS. Others have been occasionally cited, chiefly with the view of shewing something of the relation which they bear either to our more ancient MSS. or to the textus receptus.

5. As respects the omission of irrelevant matter, it may be remarked, that at the same time with the long lists of cursive MSS., has vanished from our digest the pretension of being a complete account of all various readings. And since no such complete account could be given, it became a question whether it were really answering any worthy purpose to encumber our pages with numerous insignificant readings of later MSS., or versions which could not under any circumstances enter into consideration in editing the text. And the reply to this question has been, the exclusion as a general rule of all readings which are not supported by at least some one MS. as old as the sixth century. Even with respect to these, mere variations in orthography and alteration of grammatical forms have been in this fifth edition to a great extent omitted. The list given above, pp. 94 et seq., is intended as a summary account of such matters. In a manner similar to that which is there described (under ἁλλά, καὶ γάρ, &c.) we have treated the frequent substitution of the first aorist εἶπα for the second εἶπον; 1 aor. ἔδωκα, for perfect δέδωκα; and the like.

6. The additional MSS., &c., incorporated in the digest in this edition, will be found specified in detail in the enumeration of the apparatus criticus.

7. I have given, in all cases, the authorities both for and against the text which I have adopted; and have, where it seemed requisite, inserted in the digest, in brackets and in italics, the reasons which influenced my judgment¹.

8. In some cases I have found it impossible to decide between two conflicting readings. When it seemed to me more than usually doubtful whether one or more words ought to be inserted or omitted, they have been printed in the text, but marked by square brackets. In more complex cases, where this expedient could not be used, one of the two readings stands in the text itself, the alternative one in the digest, but with accents and in the same type as the text.

9. I would recommend to the student, though it may seem irksome at first, the diligent study of the digest of various readings. It is of the first moment, to become familiar with the criticism of the sacred text: to be able to decide for oneself in each case, or at all events to be acquainted with the reasons on which others have decided. Charges of rashness are often brought against us as Editors, by persons totally unacquainted with the science of criticism: and nothing short of a patient examination of classes of various readings will prevent students from being misled by such easy and random verdicts.

10. In the digest of various readings, I have used the following signs and abbreviations:

aft, after.

al, alii = some cursive mss.

¹ Where only one or two MSS. are cited for a particular variation from the edited text, and none in support of that text, it is to be concluded that at least the remaining MSS. indicated on the margin contain the reading adopted.

appy, apparently.

ast, asterisk. w-ast, or with-ast, marked with an asterisk or asterisks : see note on "ob" below.

beg, beginning.

comm, commentary—when appended to the name of a Father, it denotes that the reading referred to is found in the body of his commentary, and not in the text printed at the head of the commentary. This last is often very much tampered with.

ed, edition.

elz, elzevir edition of the Greek Test.

e sil, e silentio collatorum.

ev, evangelistarium, i. e. a copy of the Gospels arranged for church use.

exc, except.

expr, expressly.

gr, greek—when appended to a letter denoting a Græco-latin MS. means that the reading of the Latin text differs from that of the Greek.

ins, insert—"ins καὶ AB" means that the MSS. A and B insert καὶ.

marg, margin. marg-eccles denotes that the reading cited is given on the margin as an alteration to be made in reading the passage in church, e. g. the name of our Lord, where the pronoun would otherwise stand, at the beginning of a "Gospel for the day."

ob, obelus. w-ob, or with-ob, marked with an obelus or with obeli. This abbreviation and "ast" are principally used with reference to the later Syriac version*.

om, omit—"om καὶ AB" means that the MSS. A and B omit the καὶ given in the text or inserted by other MSS.

pref, prefix. e. g. "aft τὴ ins καὶ A : pref C." "pref" means that C inserts καὶ bef τὴ instead of after it as A does.

rec, the textus receptus, or received text of the Greek Testament. Used in this edition when elz and Steph agree.

rel, reliqui—means that all the other manuscripts named on the margin have the reading to which this is appended.

* On these marks Tregelles observes : "The asterisks and obeli shew points of similarity to the Syriac version of the Old Test. made from the Hexaplar text of the LXX as revised by Origen. As that translation employs those marks, borrowed from the Greek text, to indicate variations from the Hebrew, so too here, they seemed to be used in a similar manner ; they thus point out respectively additions, and words which are marked as if they should be omitted. It looks, therefore, as if in revising, additions had been introduced marked with an asterisk, and that whatever was or was deemed redundant was marked with an obelus." (Treg. in Horne, vol. iv. p. 272.)

§ III.] OF THE MARGINAL REFERENCES. [PROLEGOMENA.

Steph, Stephens' Greek Testament.

Tischdf, Tischendorf.

transp, transpose.

Treg, Tregelles.

txt, text—when followed by a list of MSS., versions, &c., means that the reading adopted in this edition is supported by those MSS., versions, &c.

ver, verse.

vss, versions.

vv, verses.

Wtst or Wetst, Wetstein.

The figures 2, 3, &c. inserted above the line to the right hand, imply a second, third, &c. hand in a ms. Thus B¹ means the original scribe of B; C¹ the first corrector of C; C², the second; D^r, a recent corrector of D; and so on. B-corr¹ means B as corrected by the original scribe, or the contemporary διορθωτής.

The same figures below the line, imply recurrence of the reading 2, 3, &c. times in the author mentioned; e. g. Aug., Orig., Bas.

[But \mathfrak{f}_1 means (see p. 135) that Corbeian MS. which is cited by Scholz, &c. as "Corb. 1."

\mathfrak{f}_2 , "Corb. 2;" $\mathfrak{f}_{1,2}$, "Corb. 1 and 2." Similarly in the cases of g_1 , g_2 , $g_{1,2}$.

\mathfrak{f}_1^2 , means the corrector of \mathfrak{f}_1 .

f^1 , the original scribe of MS. f .]

SECTION III.

OF THE MARGINAL REFERENCES.

1. The references in the margin of this Edition of the Greek Testament are not those usually printed in other Editions. Those are references to the subject-matter of the text: and are most useful and necessary to every biblical student. As however they are now to be found in many editions of our English Bible, it seemed unnecessary to reprint them here. Instead of them, I have drawn up a body of references to verbal and idiomatical usages, which I hope will be found an addition to our apparatus criticus, as tending to exhibit, simultaneously with the text itself, the peculiarities and ἀναξ λεγόμενα of the passage under consideration.

2. The materials for constructing such a body of references have of course been principally found in the various Greek Testament Lexicons, aided by personal study of the text in matters of which Lexicons do not treat. I have also used with profit, but not extensively, Grinfield's Editio Hellenistica Novi Testamenti, and take this opportunity of acknowledging my obligations to that work.

8. The hindrances, as well as the helps, to such a compilation, should be mentioned. They mainly consisted in the almost uniform inaccuracy in the references in the existing Lexicons. In Schleusner and Parkhurst, little more than half of the passages referred to were to be found. Their citations are copied without verification. In Wahl, this was not the case, nor are the inaccuracies so many; but the errors in printing have introduced far more than were compatible with a profitable use of his very laborious and copious work. An honourable exception to the general inaccuracy of our Lexicon references I found in Robinson's Greek and English Lexicon to the New Testament, edited by Dr. Bloomfield. I was however constrained principally to use Wahl, from his greater copiousness in detail. I cannot omit to mention the very complete and accurate Concordance of Bruder, as saving the scholar very much of the complication of lexical arrangement, and giving freer scope for the exercise of his own judgment. I only wish I had been acquainted with it seventeen years ago, when I began to compile these references: as I might have been saved many a weary hour's search.

4. In the present work, *no reference has been inserted which has not been verified*¹: and I trust that the accuracy of the printing has corresponded to my earnest desire that the whole may be found correct. In the course of so many thousand citations, I cannot expect but that errors will occasionally have crept in: those which have been discovered will be found in the table of errata, and I shall still be obliged to any reader who may discover additional mistakes, to communicate with me (addressed at Messrs. Rivingtons', Waterloo Place) that they may be corrected.

5. The sources whence the references have been drawn have been, (1) the text of the Greek Testament itself, as affording instances of similarity of usage or construction,—of use of the same or different words in parallel passages of the Gospels,—or of tacit reference to the words and acts of our Lord in the Epistles:—(2) the Septuagint version of the Old Testament; as being, from the place and time of its publication, its use by the New Testament writers, and its similarity of style and diction, so full of interest in the elucidations of the sacred text:—(3) the Apocrypha, which approaches even more nearly than the LXX to the peculiar Hellenistic style of the New Testament:—and (4) the works of Josephus and Philo-Judæus, who occasionally are found using expressions and constructions similar to those in our text. To these may be added, (5) a few instances from the classic writers, especially Xenophon, justifying or elucidating New Testament words or constructions.

¹ An exception to this has arisen: as experience has approved the almost unexceptionable accuracy of Bruder's Concordance, I have generally cited from him in the later additions to my references, without verifying.

6. For convenience in arranging this body of reference, it has been found necessary to use some few signs and abbreviations, which will here be explained.

- (=) When a reference is preceded by the sign (=), it is indicated that the word which is the subject of reference is used, in the passage referred to, in the same sense as in the text.
- (||) When, in the Gospels, the sign (||) occurs in a reference, it is signified that the word occurs in the parallel place in the other Gospels, which will always be found indicated at the head of the note on the paragraph. When the sign (||) is qualified, thus, (|| Mark, or || Matt. Mark, &c.) it is signified that the word occurs in the parallel place in that Gospel or Gospels, but not in the other or others.
- (here only) When the words 'here only,' or in such and such places 'only,' occur in a reference, they are always to be understood as meaning that the word occurs in that place or those places only of the New Testament; and as having no reference (unless so implied by their following citations from the LXX) to its occurring in the LXX or elsewhere.
- (†) When a reference is followed by the sign †, it is indicated that the word does not occur in the Canonical Septuagint version of the Old Testament, though it may occur in the Apocrypha.
- (‡) When a reference is followed by the sign ‡, it is indicated that the word does not occur in the Canonical LXX in the same sense as in the text.
- (constr.) The abbreviation (constr.) occurring before a reference, indicates that it is the construction of the clause or sentence which is referred to.
- Other abbreviations will be understood from the context: e. g. 'trans. or intrans.,' that the verb is used transitively or intransitively in the passages referred to: 'gen., dat., acc.' that the verb or preposition governs these cases respectively in those passages: so of 'act., pass.' &c. &c.
- In one only case are the references not to verbal or idiomatical usage, but to subject-matter. Where the text contains a citation from or reference to the Old Testament, or to an earlier place in the New Testament, the place of that citation or reference is indicated in the margin, but in small capitals: thus: 'ISA. liii. 5.'

7. The student is requested not to consider the references in any instance as embracing the whole number of times where a word occurs in the New Testament,—unless it be expressly so stated. In by far the greater number of cases, they consist merely of a selection, at discretion, from an abundance of similar instances. At the same time considerable pains have been now taken to make some one set of references in each volume exhaustive; which one has then been used as the stock reference for that particular word or construction.

8. To avoid mistakes, I think it well to advertise the student, that when the references extend below the text, they are to be read in single lines across the page.

9. In this Fifth edition as well as in the Fourth, the whole body of references has been gone over, and many corrections and insertions made. The object proposed in doing this has been, to supply a more complete account, both of ἀπαιζ λεγόμενα and of peculiar usage of words and constructions, in the sacred Writers, however common such words or constructions may be in ordinary Greek: to add, in very many instances, references to the LXX: and to bring the former portion of my work, in which the design of the body of references had less opened before me than it afterwards did, into harmony with the subsequent volumes. In this part of the preparation of these two last editions, I have had the valuable co-operation of the Rev. Robert Hake, M.A., Minor Canon of Canterbury, without whom it would have been impossible that it should have been accomplished.

CHAPTER VII.

APPARATUS CRITICUS¹.

SECTION I.

MANUSCRIPTS OF THE GREEK TESTAMENT REFERRED TO IN THIS EDITION.

Manuscripts written in the capital, or uncial character.

A. The MS. referred to by this symbol is that commonly called the Alexandrine, or CODEX ALEXANDRINUS. It once belonged to Cyrillus Lucaris, patriarch of Alexandria and then of Constantinople, who in the year 1628 presented it to our King Charles I. It is now in the British Museum. It is on parchment in four volumes, of which three contain the Old, and one the New Testament, with the Epistle of Clement to the Corinthians. This fourth volume is exhibited open in a glass case. It will be seen by the letters in the inner margin of this Edition, that the first 24 chapters of Matthew are wanting in it, its first leaf commencing ὁ συµφωτος, ch. xxv. 6:—as also the leaves containing ἱνα, John vi. 50,—to λεγει, viii. 52. It is generally agreed that it was written at Alexandria;—it does not, however, in the Gospels, represent that commonly known as the Alexandrine text, but approaches much more nearly to the Constantinopolitan, or generally received text. The New Testament, according to its text, was edited, in uncial types cast to imitate those of the MS., by Woide, Lond. 1786, the Old Testament by Baber, Lond. 1819: and its N. T. text has now been edited in common type by Mr. B. H. Cowper, London, 1861. The date of this MS. has been variously assigned, but it is now pretty generally agreed to be the fifth century.

- B. The CODEX VATICANUS, No. 1209 in the Vatican Library at Rome; and proved, by the old catalogues, to have been there from the foundation of the Library in the 16th century. It was apparently, from internal evidence, copied in Egypt. It is on vellum, and contains the Old and New Testaments. In the latter, it is deficient from Heb. ix. 14 to the end of the Epistle;—it does not contain the Epistles to Timothy, Titus, and Philemon;—nor the Apocalypse. An edition of this celebrated codex, undertaken as long ago as 1828 by Cardinal Angelo Mai, has since his death been published at Rome. The defects of this edition are such, that it can hardly be ranked higher in usefulness than a tolerably complete collation, entirely untrustworthy in those places where it differs from former collations in representing the MS. as agreeing with the received text. An 8vo edition of the N. T. portion, newly revised by Vercellone, was published at Rome in 1859 (referred to as Verc): it of course supersedes the English reprint of the 1st edition. Even in this 2nd edition there are imperfections which render it necessary to have recourse to the MS. itself, and to the partial collations made in former times. These are, (1) that of Bartolucci (under the name of Giulio de St. Anastasia), once librarian at the Vatican, made in 1669, and preserved in manuscript in the Imperial Library (MSS. Gr. Suppl. 53) at Paris (referred to as 'Ble'); (2) that of Birch (Beh), published in various readings to the Acts and Epistles, Copenhagen, 1798—Apocalypse, 1800—Gospels, 1801; (3) that made for the great Bentley (Btly), by the Abbate Mico; this collation is published in Ford's Appendix to Woide's edition of the Codex Alexandrinus, 1799. It was made on the margin of a copy of Cephæus' Greek Testament, Argentorati 1524, still amongst Bentley's books in the Library of Trin. Coll. Camb. (4) Notes of alterations by the original scribe and other correctors. These notes were procured for Bentley by the Abbé de Stosch, and were till lately supposed to be lost. They were made by the Abbate Rulotta (Rl.), and are preserved amongst Bentley's papers in the Library of Trinity College, Cambridge (B. 17. 20). The Codex has been occasionally consulted for the verification of certain readings by Tregelles, Tischendorf, and others. A list of readings examined at Rome by the present editor (Feb. 1861), and by the Rev. E. C. Cure, Fellow of Merton College, Oxford (April 1862), will be found at the end of these prolegomena. A description, with a photograph of a portion of a page, is given in Burgon's "Letters from Rome," London 1861. This most important MS. was probably written in the fourth century (Hug, Tischendorf, al.).

- C. The CODEX EPHRAEMI, preserved in the Imperial Library at Paris, MS. Gr. No. 9.—It is a Codex rescriptus or palimpsest, consisting of the works of Ephraem the Syrian written over the MS. of extensive fragments of the Old and New Testaments². It seems to have come to France with Catherine de' Medici, and to her from Cardinal Nicolas Ridolfi. Tischendorf thinks it probable that he got it from Andrew John Lascaris, who at the fall of the Eastern Empire was sent to the East by Lorenzo de' Medici to preserve such MSS. as had escaped the ravages of the Turks. This is confirmed by the later corrections (C²) in the MS., which were evidently made at Constantinople³. But from the form of the letters, and other peculiarities, it is believed to have been written at Alexandria, or at all events, where the Alexandrine dialect and method of writing prevailed. Its text is perhaps the purest example of the Alexandrine text,—holding a place about midway between the Constantinopolitan MSS. and most of those of the Alexandrine recension. It was edited very handsomely in uncial type, with copious dissertations, &c., by Tischendorf, in 1843. He assigns to it an age at least equal to A, and places it also in the fifth century. Corrections were written in, apparently in the sixth and ninth centuries: these are respectively cited as C², C³.

² The extent of these fragments being indicated in every case by the notes in the inner margin of the text, I have not thought it necessary to swell the Prolegomena by also specifying them here. The same remark applies to the lacunæ in the other MSS.

³ The general reader may be advantageously referred to the careful and accurate account of this MS. given in the "Christian Remembrancer" for October 1862, Vol. xliv. p. 273 et seq.

- D. The CODEx CANTABRIGIENSIS, or BEZÆ,—so called because it was presented by Beza in 1581 to the University Library at Cambridge; where it is now exposed to view in a glass case. He procured it in 1562, from the monastery of S. Irenæus at Lyons. It is on parchment, and contains the Gospels and Acts, with a Latin version. Its lacunæ, which are many, will be perceived by the inner marginal letters in this edition. It once contained the Catholic Epistles: 3 Joh. 11—15 in Latin is all that now remains. It was edited with very accurate imitative types, at the expense of the University of Cambridge, by Dr. Kipling, in 1793. Mr. Scrivener is preparing a new edition carefully revised and more generally accessible. (See also foot note, p. 115). The text of the Codex Beza is a very peculiar one, deviating more from the received readings and from the principal MS. authorities than any other. It appears to have been written in France, and by a Latin transcriber ignorant of Greek, from many curious mistakes which occur in the text, and version attached. It is closely and singularly allied to the ancient Latin versions, so much so that some critics have supposed it to have been altered from the Latin: and certainly many of the phenomena of the MS. seem to bear out the idea. Where D differs in unimportant points from the other Greek MSS., the difference appears to be traceable to the influence of Latin forms and constructions. It has been observed, that in such cases it frequently agrees with the Latin codex c (see the list further on). Its peculiarities are so great, that in many passages, while the sense remains for the most part unaltered, hardly three words together are the same as in the commonly received text. And that these variations often arise from capricious alteration, is evident from the way in which the Gospels, in parallel passages, have been more than commonly interpolated from one another in this MS. The concurrence with the ancient Latin versions seems to point to a very early state of the text; and it is impossible to set aside the value of D as an index to its history;—but in critical weight it ranks the lowest of the leading MSS. Its age has been very variously given: the general opinion now is that it was written in the latter end of the fifth or the sixth century.
- E. The CODEx BASILEENSIS (Public Library at Basle, formerly B. vi. 21; now K. iv. 35). Contains the four Gospels with some considerable lacunæ. Collated by Tischendorf and Tregelles. Said to be of the middle of the eighth century.
- F. The CODEx BOREELI, once possessed by John Boreel, Dutch ambassador in London under James I. It was lost for many years, till found at Arnheim by Heringa, a professor at Utrecht. It is now in the public library at the latter place. Heringa wrote a dissertation on it, so copious as to serve for an edition of the codex itself. This dissertation was published by Vinke in 1843. Contains the four Gospels with many lacunæ, which have increased since Wetstein's time. Tischendorf in 1841 examined the codex and compared it with Heringa's collation. Tischendorf assigns it to the ninth century: Tregelles, to the tenth.

G. The Codex Harleianus, 5684, in the British Museum, brought by Andrew Seidel from the East. Contains the Gospels with many lacunæ. Collated by J. C. Wolf, to whom it once belonged, and recently by Tischendorf and Tregelles (known as Seidelii I, or Wolfii A). Ascribed to the ninth or tenth century.

H. The Codex Wolfii B, now in the public library at Hamburg. Its history is the same as that of the last MS. Its contents, the Gospels,—with many lacunæ: its assigned date, about the end of the ninth century. It was collated by Wolf, Tregelles, and Tischendorf.

I. FRAGMENTA PALIMPSESTA TISCHENDORFIANA (or Codex Tischendorfianus II.). "Certain portions of the New Test. in Greek, under Georgian writing. The parts appear to vary from the fifth to the seventh century. Examined by Tregelles, and since edited by Tischendorf in his Monumenta Sacra, 1855." (Tregelles.) The volume is now in the Imperial Library at St. Petersburg. Tischendorf states that he can distinguish the remains of seven different MSS. The three most ancient of these he considers quite equal to C or A both in age and in purity of text. The first of these [cited in this edn as I_a] contains: John xi. 50—xii. 9; xv. 12—xvi. 2; xix. 11—24. The second [I_b], 1 Cor. xv. 53—xvi. 9; Tit. i. 1—13; Acts xxviii. 8—17. The third [I_c], Mt. xiv. 13—16 and 19—23; xxiv. 37—xxv. 1; xxv. 32—45; xxvi. 31—45. Mk. ix. 14—22; xiv. 58—70. These are all ascribed to the fifth century. The fourth fragment [I_d] contains Mt. xvii. 22—xviii. 3; xviii. 11—19; xix. 5—14; Lu. xviii. 14—25; Joh. iv. 52—v. 8; xx. 17—26. The seventh [I_e], Lu. vii. 39—49; xxiv. 10—19. These two are assigned to the sixth century and compared with Cod. P. The two remaining fragments, Tischd's fifth and sixth, contain portions of the Acts and are ascribed to a century later than the two preceding.

K. The Codex Cyprius, brought from the island of Cyprus to Paris, and now in the Imperial Library there (MS. Gr. 63). Contains the Gospels (entire), memoirs of the saints of the Greek Church, and the canons of Eusebius. Collated by Tischendorf and Tregelles. Its text is peculiar and sui generis; and is consequently of much value. Assigned to the ninth century.

L. The Codex Regius Parisiensis (Bibliothèque Impériale Manuscrit 110]

grec No. 62), contains the Gospels with some lacunæ. Edited by Tischendorf in his "Monumenta Sacra," 1846, pp. 57—399. Its text, both in various readings and in grammatical forms, is of the kind which has been called Alexandrine, and is very nearly related to that of B. From the careless positions of the accents, Scholz and Griesbach think it to have been copied from some more ancient MS. which had no accents. Ascribed by Tischendorf to the eighth century; by Tregelles and others, to the ninth.*

M. The Codex Campianus (Paris: Bibl. Imp. MS. Gr., 48). Presented to Louis XIV. by the Abbé des Champs, in 1706. Contains the Gospels, with notices of the saints of the Greek Church, the Canons of Eusebius, and much inserted matter betokening late date. Its text is irregular in character, and has some readings common only to itself and K. Assigned to the latter part of the ninth or beginning of the tenth century. Collated by Tregelles, and copied by Tischendorf.

N. CODEX PURPUREUS. "These fragments (of the sixth century) are found in three places: four leaves are in the British Museum [Cotton. C. xv.], denoted J or I by Wetstein and others; two are at Vienna [Imperial Library, Cod. Theol. Gr. num. 2 Lambec.], to which the notation N was formerly restricted; and six in the Vatican [No. 3785], called by Scholz Γ. Edited by Tischendorf in his Monumenta Sacra, 1846." (Tregelles.)

P. Q. By these symbols are designated the portions of two ancient MSS., discernible (as also are fragments of Ulphilas' gothic version) under the later writing of a volume known as the Codex Carolinus in the ducal library at Wolfenbüttel. P (GUELPHERBYTANUS A.) contains fragments of each of the Gospels. Q (GUELPH. B.) fragments of Luke and John. Both are probably of the sixth century. They were edited by F. A. Knittel in 1762; and, more thoroughly by Tischendorf in 1860, "Monumenta Sacra," vol. iii.

R. CODEX NITRIENSIS. A palimpsest in the British Museum (Additional MS. 17211): the same vol. which contains the palimpsest Homer. Brought from a Nitrian monastery. Contains large fragments of St. Luke's Gospel. Edited by Tischendorf in 1857, "Monumenta Sacra," vol. ii. Tregelles had however previously collated it, and has given several corrections of Tischendorf's edition; these are noticed in their proper places in the digest. This MS. is ascribed to the sixth century.

S. The Codex Vaticanus 354, contains the Gospels entire, with the canons of Eusebius. Written by Michael, a monk, in the year 949. Collated by Birch, whose collation Treg. and Tischdf. have used; hence when quoted as agreeing with the received text, its testimony is only “e silentio Birchii.”

* Griesbach describes this MS. as 'incredibili cum venerandis illis exemplaribus quas Origenes olim suis manibus versavit consensu insignem.'

- T. CODEX BORGIANUS 1, in the Library of the Propaganda at Rome, of the fifth century (probably). Contains fragments of Lu. and Joh. with a Sahidic version. The portions Joh. vi. 28—67; vii. 6—viii. 31 were published by A. A. Georgi, at Rome, in 1789: and examined by Tischendorf. This Græco-Egyptian MS. also contains a portion of St. Luke, ch. xxii. 20 to xxiii. 20, which was first brought to my notice by Dr. Tregelles, as being mentioned by Zoega in his “Catalogus codicum Copticorum MSS. qui in Museo Borgiano Velitris adservantur.” My brother, the Rev. Bradley H. Alford, happening to be at Rome, was fortunate enough to obtain permission to collate this ancient fragment, and sent me the collation, from which the readings were, in edn. 4 of this vol., first published. Two other portions of the same MS. were once in the possession of C. G. Woide and were published by Ford in the Appendix to the Codex Alexandrinus, Oxford, 1799. They comprise Lu. xii. 15—xiii. 32; Joh. viii. 33—42.
- U. The Codex Nanianus 1, in St. Mark’s library at Venice (I. viii.), contains the Gospels entire, with the canons of Eusebius. It has been collated by Tischendorf and Tregelles. Assigned to the tenth century.
- V. A MS. in the library of the Holy Synod at Moscow. (No number, referred to as “in a box.”) Contains the Gospels,—as far as Joh. vii. 39, in uncial letters of about the ninth century (Tischdf.);—after that, in cursive characters of the thirteenth century. Collated by Matthæi.
- X. The Codex Monacensis, formerly Ingolstadiensis. (University Library, Munich, I. 26.) Contains the four Gospels with numerous lacunæ. It is accompanied by an interspersed commentary. Ascribed to the end of the ninth, or beginning of the tenth century. Collated by Tischendorf and Tregelles.
- Y. A fragment, No. 225, in the Barberini library at Rome. Contains Joh. xvi. 8—xix. 41. Assigned to the eighth or ninth century. Edited by Tischendorf, “Monumenta Sacra,” 1846, pp. 37—50.
- Z. The CODEX RESCRIPTUS DUBLINENSIS, in the library of Trinity College, Dublin. Contains, of the N. T., the Gospel of Matthew. It was discovered (under the cursive writing of a copy of Chrysostom de Sacerdotio, extracts from Epiphanius, &c.) by Dr. Barrett, who published all that he could read in not very exact copper-plate fac simile at the expense of the college in 1801. Tregelles, in 1853, by the aid of a chemical mixture was able to decipher the portions which had baffled Barrett, and carefully re-collated the whole. It has many lacunæ, which will be seen by the letters in our inner margin. The date assigned to it is the sixth century.

- Γ. Codex Tischendorfianus IV. A MS. brought by Tischendorf from the East, and now in the Bodleian Library (Auct. T. Infra II. 2). It contains portions of St. Matthew and St. John, the greater part of St. Mark and the whole of St. Luke. Collated by Tischendorf and Tregelles. In 1859, Tischendorf procured 99 more leaves of the same MS.; these are now at St. Petersburg, and contain Mt. i. 1—v. 31; ix. 6—xii. 18; xiv. 15—xx. 25; xxiii. 13—xxviii. 20, and the whole of Joh. minus the two portions [vi. 14—viii. 8; xv. 24—xix. 6] preserved in the Bodleian. Ascribed to the ninth century.
- Δ. The Codex San Gallensis, in the library at St. Gall. Contains the Gospels entire, except Joh. xix. 17—35, with a Latin version. Edited in lithographed facsimile by Rettig, at Zurich, in 1836. This MS. and Cod. Boernerianus (G of St. Paul's Epistles: see Prolegg. vol. II.) are of the same country and date (i. e. Switzerland, in the latter part of the ninth century), and originally formed part of the same volume.
- Θ. The Codex Tischendorfianus I, brought by Tischendorf from the East, now in the Library of the university at Leipsic. It consists of four leaves, containing a few fragments of Matthew; xiii. 46—55 (but this almost illegible); xiv. 8—29; xv. 4—14. Of the latter part of the seventh century. Edited by Tischendorf "Monumenta Sacra," 1846, pp. 1—10.
- Α. Codex Tischendorfianus III, now in the Bodleian (Auct. T. Infra I. 1). Contains the whole of the Gospels of St. Luke and St. John. Collated by Tischendorf and Tregelles. Ascribed to the eighth or ninth century. An early cursive copy of Mt. and Mk. taken by Tischendorf to St. Petersburg, in 1859, is said by him ("Notitia Cod. Sinaitici," p. 58) to be part of the same codex.
- Ξ. CODEX ZACYNTHIUS. Edited by Tregelles, London, 1861, with the types cast for printing the Codex Alexandrinus. The following is an abridgment of his account of the MS.: "On the 11th of August, 1858, I received a letter from Dr. Paul de Lagarde of Berlin, informing me that a palimpsest MS., hitherto unused, containing a considerable portion of St. Luke's Gospel, with a Catena, was in the Library of the British and Foreign Bible Society. It is noted in the Catalogue, and on the back, '24, Greek Evangelistorium. Parchment.' In many parts the ancient writing is illegible, except in a very good light. The later writing is a Greek Lectionary from the Four Gospels, and belongs, I suppose, to the thirteenth century. The elder writing must have been part of a volume of large folio size; for the leaves are now folded across, the later writing running the other way. The text is in round full well-formed Uncial letters, such as I should have had no difficulty in ascribing to the sixth century, were it not that the Catena of the same age has the round letters (ΘΘΟC) so cramped as to make me believe that it belongs to the eighth century. Besides the ordinary κεφάλαια or τίτλοι, this MS. contains also the same chapters as the Vatican MS., similarly numbered. The only other document in which I have ever seen this Capitulatio Vaticana is the Vatican Codex itself; nor do I know of its being found elsewhere. Occasionally the same portion of Scripture occurs twice, when accompanied by a different Patristic extract."

N. The CODEX SINAITICUS. Procured by Tischendorf, in 1859, from the Monastery of St. Catherine on Mount Sinai. A magnificent edition prepared at the expense of the Emperor of Russia appeared in January, 1863. The Codex Frederico-Augustanus (now at Leipzig), obtained in 1844 from the same monastery, is a portion of the same copy of the Greek Bible, the 148 leaves of which containing the entire New Testament, the Ep. of Barnabas, parts of Hermas, and 199 more leaves of the Septuagint have now been edited by the discoverer. The assertion made by Dr. Simonides that the MS. was written by himself about 1840, he being then a very young man (accounts of his age vary) is contradicted by the phenomena of the MS. itself; and is moreover only one of an astonishing series which the learned men of Greece, Germany, and England have found it impossible to believe. The MS. has four columns on a page, and has been altered by several different correctors, one or more of whom Tischendorf considers to have lived in the sixth century. The work of the original scribe has been examined, not only by Tischendorf, but by Tregelles and other competent judges, and is by them assigned to the fourth century. The internal character of the text, down to the most minute particulars, agrees with the external, as the student may judge for himself by its readings given in the digest on the Gospel of St. John. The correctors as distinguished by Tischendorf are:—A, of the same age with the MS. itself, probably the corrector who revised the book, before it left the hands of the scribe, denoted therefore by us corr'; B, who in the first page of Mt. began inserting breathings, accents, &c., but did not carry out his design, and touched only a few later passages; C^a (cited as N^a) has corrected very largely throughout the book. Wherever it is not stated to the contrary in our digest, it is to be understood that C^a altered the reading cited as found in

№¹; C^b (cited as №^b) lived about the same time as C^a, i. e. some centuries later than the original scribe. These are all that we need notice here. Tischendorf has distinguished most minutely between contemporary scribes and correctors. A full account is given in the "Christian Remembrancer" for April, 1863. The Editor has been able to procure a complete collation of the Gospel of St. John, from the expensive imperial edition, which is the only one that reached this country in time to be used for this volume. In the other Gospels the readings given in the "Notitia Cod. Sin." are inserted in their proper places, and also some others communicated by Professor Tischendorf to Dr. Tregelles, who kindly forwarded them to the present editor¹.

Frag-cant. Fragmentum Cantabrigiense. Now preserved in a frame between pieces of glass in the Library of Trinity College, Cambridge. Ascribed to the eighth century. The scraps of which this fragment is made up were discovered in 1861 by Mr. H. Bradshaw, Fellow of King's Coll. Camb., in the binding of a copy of Gregory Nazianzen formerly brought from Mt. Athos. It contains portions of Mk. vii. viii. ix. The text is very peculiar and interesting. The readings have been inserted in this edition from a photograph.

Frag. Mosq. (called O by Tischdf.) Fragmentum Mosquense. A Codex of the Holy Synod at Moscow, No. 120. From Mount Athos. It consists of 8 leaves, used in the binding of a MS. of Chrysostom, and contains Joh. i. 1—4; xx. 10—13; 15—17; 20—24. Edited by Matthæi, in one of the Appendices in his N. T. Appears to be of the ninth century.

Frag. Neap. (W^b in Tischdf. ed. 7.) Fragmentum Neapolitanum rescriptum. Naples Library, II. C. 15 (LXXXIX.). Contains beneath more recent (fourteenth century) ecclesiastical writing of the Greek Church, twelve or fourteen leaves of an ancient MS. of the Gospels, probably of the eighth century. Only one page, containing Mk. xiv. 32—39, was examined by Tischendorf.

Frag. Nitr. (N^b in Tischdf.) Fragmentum Nitriense. A few verses of the xiiith and xvth chapters of St. John's Gospel deciphered by Tischendorf under Syriac writing in a British Museum MS. (Ad-

¹ It may be well here to mention, that there is in preparation at the University Press, Oxford, an edition of the New Testament which will exhibit the entire texts of the earliest known MSS. in parallel columns. Vol. I. (already printed) contains the Gospels from ABCD and (in St. Matthew) Z. Vol. II. (also printed) contains the Acts from ABCDE, the Catholic Epistles from ABC, the Pauline Epistles from ABCD^{er}, the Apocalypse from AB²PC. Vol. III. will contain notes stating the alterations made by later hands in each MS., a collation of the Codex Sinaiticus, a general account of the plan of the work, facsimile plates, &c.

- ditional, 17136) brought from the Nitrian valleys. Edited by Tischdf. in "Mon. Sacra Nov. Coll. vol. ii." Tischendorf ascribes these fragments to the fifth or even to the fourth century.
- Frag. Par. (W^a or W in Tischdf.) A fragment in the Imperial Library at Paris, attached to MS. Gr. 314, containing only two leaves, Lu. ix. 36—47; x. 12—22. Edited by Tischendorf in "Mon. Sacra," 1846, pp. 51—56. Ascribed to the eighth century.
- Frag. Sang. (W^a in Tischdf. ed. 7.) Fragmentum Sangallense. Three leaves published by Tischendorf, Mon. Sacra, vol. iii. Contains Mk. ii. 8—16; Lu. i. 20—32; 64—79. Ascribed to the ninth century.
- Frag. Sin. (A in Tischdf. ed. 2.) Two fragments, Mt. xx. 8—15; Lu. i. 14—20, found by Tischendorf in the monastery of St. Catherine, Mount Sinai. Published in "Annales Vindobonenses," 1846. Of the former part of the ninth century.
- Cod. Guelph., Cod. Bodl., Cod. Veron., and Cod. Turic. are MSS. at Wolfenbüttele, the Bodleian, Verona, and Turin respectively, which contain one or more of the hymns in Lu. i. ii. Tischendorf calls them O^a, O^b, O^c, O^d, and ascribes the first two to the ninth, and the last two to the sixth century.
- Coisl.-oct.-marg., or Coisl.-xxx-marg. (F^a in Tischdf.) On the margin of the great Coislinian Octateuch of the Septuagint several texts from the N. T. are written in uncial characters of the sixth or seventh century. The following are the passages from the Gospels: Mt. v. 48; xii. 48; xxvii. 25; Lu. i. 42; ii. 24; xxiii. 21; Joh. v. 35; vi. 53, 55. The whole are published by Tischendorf, "Monumenta Sacra," 1846, p. 400.

Manuscripts written in cursive letters.

(I.) *Scrivener's Manuscripts*⁶.

- a. Lambeth 1175. Brought from the Greek Archipelago by Professor Carlyle. "Very few rare or noticeable readings will be found in this document, which approaches as nearly to the received text as many of a much lower date." Probably of the eleventh century.
- b. Lambeth 1176. "Well merits Burney's commendation, 'eximie notæ.'" About the twelfth century.

⁶ These MSS., none of which (except ev-y) have as yet been shewn to be of any great critical value, have been occasionally cited in the present edition (as Scr's a, Scr's b c d, and the like); especially in those places where their evidence may help to point out the time at which the more modern of the received readings arose. "Scr's mss.," appended to any reading in the digest, means that all the MSS. in this list which contain the passage, with the exception of any (Scr's c g, or the like) expressly cited for some opposing reading. The remarks given above are extracted from Scrivener's own description.

- c. Lambeth 1177. "Written with irreverent and scandalous negligence, but abounding with remarkable readings frequently countenanced by more ancient authorities." Probably of the twelfth century.
- d. Lambeth 1178. Tenth or eleventh century.
- e. Lambeth 1179. Many lacunæ. Possibly of the tenth century.
- f. Lambeth 1192. Of very little critical value. Of the thirteenth century.
- g. Ephesus, Lambeth 528. (71 of critical editions of the N. T.) Brought to England in 1675 by Traheron. Dated A.D. 1160.
- h. British Museum, Arundel 524. About the eleventh century.
- i. Trinity College, Cambridge, B. x. 17. Brought from Mount Athos. Belonged to Bentley. Assigned to the thirteenth century.
- k. British Museum, Additional MS., 11800. Came from the library of the Bishop of Cæsarea Philippi at the foot of Lebanon. Eleventh century.
- l. Codex Wordsworth. In Dr. Wordsworth's possession. *Thirteenth century*¹. [= g in Acts and Epistles.]
- m. (Scholz's 201) British Museum, Additional MS. 11837. Contains the whole New Testament. (See 201 below.) Formerly at Florence. Purchased for the Brit. Mus. from the heirs of Dr. Sam. Butler, Bp. of Lichfield. Dated A.D. 1357.
- n. British Museum, Burney 18. Contains the Gospels and two leaves of the Ep. to the Hebrews (ch. xii. 17 to end). Dated A.D. 1866.
- o. British Museum, Burney 19. Belonged in 1809 to the Library of the Escurial. Possibly one of the MSS. numbered 226—233 below. Assigned to the tenth or eleventh century.
- p. British Museum, Burney 20. Written by a monk named Theophilus, A.D. 1285.
- q. Codex Theodori. When collated by Mr. Scrivener it was the property of Pickering the publisher. Written by Theodore A.D. 1295.
- r. British Museum, Burney 21. Written by Theodore, A.D. 1292. Text very similar to that of q.
- s. British Museum, Burney 23. Very much mutilated in Lu. Ends at Joh. viii. 14. Written in the twelfth century.
- t. Lambeth 1850. St. John's Gospel appended to Damasc. de Fide. Written about the fourteenth century.

¹ "I regard codices l m n as representatives of the ordinary Greek copies in general use for two centuries before the invention of printing. The connexion between m and n is too close to be accidental, and I can only conjecture that they were written in the same monastery, though by different hands. Nearly as they approach the standard or printed text, they still exhibit some remarkable and rare readings." (Scrivener.)

- u and v, once formed part of the Carlyle collection, but were returned in 1817 to the Patriarch of Jerusalem. u badly collated in Mt. and Mk. for Carlyle. v collated in Mk. i. 1—iv. 16: Joh. vii. 53—viii. 11 by Dr. Burney. The readings from these collations, and from his own accurate collations of MSS. a to h and k to t published by Scrivener in "A full and exact collation of about 20 Gr. MSS," 8vo. Cambridge, 1853.
- v. The readings of this MS. are given (with those of i and w) in the Appendix to Scrivener's "Codex Augiensis." When cited in this volume it is referred to as 236. (See below.)
- w. Trinity College, Cambridge, B. x. 16. Written A.D. 1316. [= l in Acts and Epistles.]
- ev—y. Brit. Mus. Burney 22. Dated 1319, but Scrivener thinks this was added some time after the writing of the MS. and that it really dates from the twelfth century. The text is a very important one.

A few EVANGELISTARIA have been occasionally quoted, but as their evidence has been nowhere particularly examined in this edition it will be sufficient to refer to Scrivener's "Introduction to N. T. Criticism," as containing the latest information with regard to them. ev-y has been very frequently cited; see above under Scrivener's MSS.

See Horne, pp. 243—257.

The following ancient MSS. of Jerome's Vulgate are cited when they differ from the Clementine edition.

Proleg. p. 1, line 8 of text, add the following foot-note:—

In reading 'Ιουδαίας in Luke iv. 44 (to the authorities for which, the Codex Sinaiticus must now be added) would seem to introduce an exception. But the notice of a ministry in Judaea would even thus be merely incidental and general: and no visit to Jerusalem is implied.

Title] εὐαγγέλιον, in earlier Greek, signifies a present made as a return for good news (see Hom. Od. ξ. 152. 166, also 2 Kings iv. 10), or a sacrifice offered in thanksgiving for the same (Aristoph. Eq. 658); in later Greek, the good news itself, as in LXX (2 Kings xviii. 20, 22, 25, in all which the noun may be, either from reading or construction, -ia or -ion), and N. T. passim, in the appropriated sense of the good news of salvation by Christ Jesus. Hence it came to be applied to the writings themselves which contain this good news, very early: so Justin M. Apol. i. 66, p. 83, οἱ ἀπόστολοι ἐν τοῖς γενομένοις ἐκ' αὐτῶν ἀπομνημονεύμασιν, ἃ καλεῖται εὐαγγέλια. κατὰ M.] as delivered by Matthew—implies authorship or editorship: so Ὁμηρος κατὰ Ἀρίσταρχον. This use of the prep. denotes, generally, the relation of things to persons, cf. Thuc. vi. 16, ἐν τῇ κατ' αὐτοῦ βίῃ,—i. 54, τὰ κατὰ σφᾶς ναύαγια,—and see Bernhardt, Syntax, p. 241. It is not merely a genitive—of Matthew (as τὸ εὐαγγ. μου, Rom. xvi. 25, al.), which would have been used, had it been meant.—Nor does it signify, that the original teaching was Matthew's, and the present Gospel drawn up after that teaching. See Prolegg. to Matt. Eusebius, H. E. iii. 24, says, Ματθαῖος . . . γραφῇ παραδοὺς τὸ κατ' αὐτὸν εὐαγγέλιον.

CHAP. I. 1—17. GENEALOGY OF JESUS CHRIST.

1. βίβλος γενέσεως] Not always used of a pedigree only: see ref. Here however it appears that it refers exclusively to the genealogy, by Ἰησοῦ χριστοῦ being used in the enunciation, and the close being Ἰησοῦς ὁ λεγόμενος Χριστός. Then ver. 17 forms a conclusion to it, and ver. 18 passes on to other matter. Ἰησοῦ] see on ver. 21.

χριστοῦ] = ἡγῶ, appointed. In ref. it is used of kings, priests, prophets, and of the promised Deliverer. Theophylact says, λέγεται ὁ κύριος, χριστός· καὶ ὡς βασιλεὺς, ἐβασίλευσε γὰρ κατὰ τῆς ἁμαρτίας· καὶ ὡς ἱερεὺς, προσήγαγε γὰρ ἑαυτὸν θῆμα ὑπὲρ ἡμῶν· ἐχρίσθη δὲ καὶ αὐτὸς κυρίως τῷ ἀληθινῷ ἑλαίῳ, τῷ ἁγίῳ πνεύματι. It is here used (see ver. 16) in that sense in which it became affixed to Ἰησοῦς as the name of our Lord. It does not once thus occur in the progress of the Evangelic history; only in the prefatory parts of the Gospels, here and vv. 16, 17, 18: Mark i. 1: John i. 17, and once in the mouth υἱοῦ] both times refers to our Lord. ἡγῆς (Ben-David) was an especial title of the Messiah: see reff. That He should be son of Abraham, was too solemn a subject of prophecy to be omitted here, even though implied in the other. These words serve to shew the character of the Gospel, as written for Jews: οὐδὲν γὰρ οὕτως ἀνίκανοι τοῖς ἱεροῦδαϊσιν πεπιστευκότας, ὡς τὸ μαθεῖν ὅτι ἐκ σπέρματος Ἀβραὰμ καὶ Δαυὶδ ᾗν ὁ χριστός. Euthymius. Luke, ch. iii. 23 ff., carries his genealogy further back.

2. καὶ τ. ἀδελφ. These additions probably indicate that Matt. did not take his genealogy from any family or public documents, but constructed it himself. Cf. also Grot., 'Obiter Matthæus Christum ut cognatum omnibus Israelitis commendat.'

3.] These children of Judah were not born in marriage: see Gen. xxxviii. 16—30. Both the sons are named, probably as recalling the incident connected with their birth. The reason for the women (Thamar, Rahab, Ruth, and Bathsheba) being mentioned, has been variously assigned: by Wetst., ut tacita Judæorum objectioni occurreretur: by Fritzsche, for the sake of minute accuracy. It most probably is that given by Maldonatus: 'Prætermisit Evangelista quod ordinarium erat, quod autem singulare et dubium exposuit.' There may be something also in that suggested by Grotius: 'Mulieres in hoc sensu obiter paucæ nominantur, extraneo ortu aut criminibus nobiles, quarum historia ad vocationem idololatrarum et criminis-orum per Christi evangelium proludit:' as also in De Wette's view, that they serve as types of the mother of our Lord, and are consequently named in the course of the genealogy, as she is at the end of it.

5. Ραχάβ] "Rachab illam Hierichuntinam dici, vel articulus, τῆς 'P., ejusque vis relativa docet." Bengel. It has been imagined, on chronological grounds, that this Rachab must be a different person from Rahab of Jericho. But those very grounds completely tally with their identity. For Naashon (father of Salmon), prince of Judah (1 Chron. ii. 10), offered his offering at the setting up of the tabernacle (Num. vii. 12) 39 years before the taking of Jericho. So that Salmon would be of mature age at or soon after that event; at which time Rahab was probably young, as her father and mother were living (Josh. vi. 23). Nor is it any objection that Achan, the fourth in descent from Judah by Zara, is contemporary with Salmon, the sixth of the other branch: since the generations in the line of Zara average 69 years, and those in the line of Phares 49, both within the limits of probability. The difficulty of the interval of 366 years between Rahab and David does not belong to this passage only, but equally to Ruth iv. 21, 22; and is by no means insuperable, especially when the extreme old age of Jesse, implied in 1 Sam. xvii. 12, is considered.—I may add that, considering Rahab's father and mother were alive, the house would hardly be called the house of Rahab except on account of the character commonly assigned

8. Ἰωράμ Ὀζίας] Three kings, viz., Ahaziah, Joash, Amaziah (1 Chron. iii. 11, 12), are here omitted [supplied in syr-cu, lat-a, D in Luke]. Some [Spanheim, Lightf., Ebrard, &c.] think that they were erased on account of their connexion, by means of Athaliah, with the accursed house of Ahab. Simeon is omitted by Moses in blessing the tribes (Deut. xxxiii.): the descendants of Zebulun and Dan are passed over in 1 Chron., and none of the latter tribe are sealed in Rev. vii. But more probably such erasure, even if justifiable by that reason, was not made on account of it, but for convenience, in order to square the numbers of the different portions of the genealogies, as here. Compare as illustrating such omissions, 1 Chron. viii. 1 with Gen. xvi. 21.

11. Ἰωσείας Ἰεχον.] Eliakim, son of Josiah and father of Jechonias, is omitted; which was objected to the Christians by Porphyry. The reading which inserts Joacim (i. e. Eliakim) rests on hardly any foundation, and would make fifteen generations in the second tetrastade. The solution of the difficulty by supposing the name to apply to both Eliakim and his son, and to mean the former in ver. 11 and the latter in ver. 12, is unsupported by example, and contrary to the usage of the genealogy. When we notice that the ἀδελφὸί of Jechonias are his uncles, and find this way of speaking sanctioned by 2 Chron. xxxvi. 10, where Zedekiah, one of these, is called his brother, we are led to seek our solution in some recognized manner of speaking of these kings, by which Eliakim and his son were not accounted two distinct generations. If we compare 1 Chron. iii. 16 with 2 Kings xxiv. 17, we can hardly fail to see that there is some confusion in the records of Josiah's family. In the latter passage, where we have "his father's brother," the LXX render τὸν υἱὸν ἀβροῦ. Lord A. Hervey, in his careful work on the genealogies of our Lord, has suggested a reason for the difficulty: viz. that the text may originally have stood thus: Ἰωσείας δὲ ἐγέννησεν τὸν Ἰωακίμ καὶ τοὺς ἀδελφούς αὐτοῦ, Ἰωακίμ δὲ ἐγέννησεν τὸν Ἰωακίμ ἐπὶ τῆς μετοικεσίας Βαβυλῶνος, μετὰ δὲ τὴν μετ. B. Ἰωακίμ ἐγέννησεν τὸν Σαλαθιήλ, κ.τ.λ., and a copyist may have omitted the Ἰωακ. δ. ἱ. γ. τὸν Ἰωακ. as an accidental repetition. This view may perhaps be imagined to derive some support from the digest: but it seems to me that the objection to it is, the present occurrence of ¹Ιεχονίας and -ας in all our copies. This Lord A. Hervey does not satisfactorily account for in saying "the form ¹Ιεχονίας was doubtless substituted in St. Matthew's Gospel much later, to bring it into accordance with 1 Chron. iii." ἐπὶ τῆς μετ. at the time of the migration to Babylon (on this usage of ἐπι with a gen., derived from its meaning of local juxtap., or superimposition, see Bernhardt, Syntax, p. 246):— and μετὰ τὴν μετ., after the migration. For the construction, μετ. Βαβ., see ref.

12. ¹Ιεχον. . . . Σαλαθ.] So also the genealogy in 1 Chron. iii. 17. When, therefore, it is denounced (Jer. xxii. 30) that Jeconiah should be 'childless,' this word must be understood as explained by the rest of the verse, 'for no man of his seed shall prosper, sitting upon the throne of David and ruling any more in Judah.' The LXX render this word ἱεχ, ἐκθήρυον: but the Talmudical writers explain it according to our rendering. Σαλαθ. . . . Ζοροβ.] There is no difficulty here which does not also exist in the O. T. Zerubbabel is there usually called the son of Shealtiel (Salathiel). Ezra iii. 2, &c. Neh. xii. 1, &c. Hag. i. 1, &c. In 1 Chron. iii. 19, Zerubbabel is said to have been the son of Pedaiiah, brother of Salathiel. Either this may have been a different Zerubbabel, or Salathiel may, according to the law, have raised up seed to his brother.

13. Ζοροβ. . . . Αβιούδ] Abiud is not mentioned as a son of the Zerubbabel in 1 Chron. iii.—Lord A. Hervey, p. 122 ff., has made it probable that Abiud is identical with the Hodaiah of 1 Chron. iii. 24, and the Juda of Luke iii. 26. Dr. Mill (p. 178, note) mentions this conjecture, but does not adopt it. The objection, that thus the first generation after Zerubbabel would be omitted, need not have much weight, after the omission of three generations in the last tesseradecade. I cannot but recommend to the student the perusal of Lord A. Hervey's work. Whether or not we may be inclined to adopt his conjectures on so intricate and uncertain a subject as the reconciling of the genealogies, too much praise cannot be given to the spirit of combined Christian reverence and enlightened critical courage in which it is treated throughout.—On the comparison of this genealogy with that given in Luke, see notes, Luke iii. 23—38.

17. γενεαὶ δεκατέσσαρες] If we carefully observe Matthew's arrangement, we shall have no difficulty in completing the three tesseradecades. For the first is from Abraham to David, of course inclusive. The second from David (again inclusive) to the migration; which gives no name, as before, to be included in both the second and third periods, but which is mentioned simultaneously with the beget-

the Life of our Lord, p. 56. 23. τοῦτο 23 ἔλκον] It is impossible to interpret ἴνα
 in any other sense than in order that.
 The words τοῦτο δ. δ. γίγ. and the uniform usage of the N. T., in which ἴνα is never used except in this sense, forbid any other. Nor, if rightly viewed, does the passage require any other. Whatever may have been the partial fulfilment of the prophecy in the time of Ahaz, its reference to a different time, and a higher deliverance, is undeniable : and then, whatever causes contributed to bring about τοῦτο ἔλκον, might be all summed up in the fulfilment of the divine purpose, of which that prophecy was the declaration. The accomplishment of a promise formally made is often alleged as the cause of an action extending wider than the promise, and purposed long before its utterance.
 And of course these remarks apply to every passage where ἴνα or ὅπως πληρωθῇ are used. Such a construction can have but one meaning. If such meaning involve us in difficulty regarding the prophecy itself, far better leave such difficulty, in so doubtful a matter as the interpretation of prophecy, unsolved, than create one in so simple a matter as the rendering of a phrase whose meaning no indifferent person could doubt. πλη- ρωθῇ] The immediate and literal fulfilment of the prophecy seems to be related in Isa. viii. 1—4. Yet there the child was not called Emmanuel : but in ver. 8 that name is used as applying to one of far greater dignity. Again, Isa. ix. 6 seems to be a reference to this prophecy, as also Micah v. 3. 23. ἡ παρθένος] Such is the rendering of the LXX. The Hebrew word is the more general term מְרִימָה, and is translated by Aquil., Symm., and Theodot. ἡ νεάνις. De Wette cites the LXX rendering as a proof that the prophecy was then understood of the Messiah.

 But is it not much more probable that Aquila and the others rendered it νεάνις to avoid this application? Can it be shewn that the birth of the Messiah from a παρθένος was matter of previous expect- ation? Certainly Pearson (on the Creed, art. iii.) fails to substantiate this.

καλέσουσιν] This indefinite plural is surely not without meaning here. Men shall call—i. e. it shall be a name by which He shall be called—one of his appellations. The change of person from καλέσει, which could not well have been cited here, seems to shew, both that the prophecy had a literal fulfilment at the time, and that it is here quoted in a form suited to its greater and final fulfilment.
 The Hebrew was תִּקְרָא 'thou shalt call' (fem.).

Ἐμμανουήλ] = הָעִמָּנוּאֵל, God
 (is) with us. In Isaiah, prophetic primarily of deliverance from the then impending war; but also of final and glorious deliverance by the manifestation of God in the flesh.

23 ἐστὶν μεθ'] This addition is by some used to shew that Matthew wrote his Gospel in Greek, not in Hebrew, in which it would not be likely to occur. On the other hand, it is said, it might have been inserted by the person who translated the Gospel into Greek.

sense of this verse we may observe, (1) That the primâ facie impression on the reader certainly is, that οὐκ ἐγένεσεν was confined to the period of time here mentioned. (2) That there is nothing in Scripture tending to remove this impression, either (α) by narration,—and the very use of the term, ἀδελφοὶ κυρίου (on which see note at ch. xiii. 55), without qualification, shews that the idea was not repulsive: or (β) by implication,—for every where in the N. T. marriage is spoken of in high and honourable terms; and the words of the angel to Joseph rather imply, than discountenance, such a supposition. (3) On the other hand, the words of this verse do not require it; the idiom being justified on the contrary hypothesis. See reff. On the whole it seems to me, that no one would ever have thought of interpreting the verse any otherwise than in its primâ facie meaning, except to force it into accordance with a preconceived notion of the perpetual virginity of Mary. It is characteristic, and historically instructive, that the great impugner of the view given above should be Jerome, the impugner of marriage itself: and that his opponents in its interpretation should have been branded as heretics by after-ages. See a brief notice of the controversy in Milman, Hist. of Latin Christianity, i. 72 ff. As to the expression, compare the remarkable parallel, Diog. Laert. iii. 1. 2, where he says of the father of Plato, καθάρην γάμου φυλάξαι, ἕως τῆς ἀποκνήσεως, with ib. 4 (said of Plato) ἵσχυι δ' ἀδελφότης Ἀδείμαντον κ. CHAP. II. 1—12.] VISIT AND ADORATION OF MAGI FROM THE EAST. 1. Βηθ. τῆς Ἰουδ.] There was another Bethlehem in the tribe of Zebulun, near the sea of Galilee, Josh. xix. 15. The name Bethlehem-Judah is used, Jud. xvii. 7, 8, 9: 1 Sam. xvii. 12. Another name for our Bethlehem was Ephrath, Gen. xxxv. 19; xlvi. 7; or Ephrata, Mic. v. 2. It was six Roman miles to the south of Jerusalem, and was known as 'the city of David,' the origin of his family, Ruth i. 1, 19. ἐν ἡμέραις Ἡρώδου] HEROD THE GREAT, son of Antipater, an Idumean, by an Arabian mother, made king of Judæa on occasion of his having fled to Rome, being driven from his tetrarchy by the pretender Antigonus. (Jos. Antt. xiv. 14. 4.) This title was confirmed to him after the battle of Actium by Octavianus. He sought to strengthen his throne by a series of cruelties and slaughters, putting to death even his wife Mariamne, and his sons Alexander and Aristobulus. His cruelties, and his affectation of Gentile customs, gained for him a hatred among the Jews, which neither his magnificent rebuilding of the temple, nor his liberality in other public works, nor his provident care of the people during a severe famine, could mitigate. He died miserably, five days after he had put to death his son Antipater, in the seventieth year of his age, the thirty-eighth of his reign, and the 750th year of Rome. The events here related took place a short time before his death, but necessarily more than forty days; for he spent the last forty days of his life at Jericho and the baths of Callirhoe, and therefore would not be found by the magi at Jerusalem. The history of Herod's reign is contained in Josephus, Antt. books xiv.—xvii. μάγοι ἀπὸ ἀνατολῶν] Magi from the East; (not ἀπ. ἀνατ. παρ.) The absence of the art. after μάγοι is no objection to this interpretation. In fact it could not have been here expressed, because the concrete noun μάγοι is not distributed: as neither could it in such an expression as ἀνθρωπος ἐν πνεύματι ἀκαθάρτῳ, Mark i. 28. In the case of an anarthrous abstract noun, the art. may follow, but may also be omitted, cf. καρὰ ἐν πνεύματι ἀγίῳ, Rom. xiv. 17: the distinction being, that χ. ἢ ἐν πν. ἀγ. would specify, among various kinds of joy, that one, which is ἐν πν. ἀγ., whereas χ. ἐν πν. ἀγ. merely asserts the fact that the joy is ἐν πν. ἀγ., without suggesting any comparison with other kinds.—De W. remarks, that if ἀπὸ ἀναρ. belonged to παρεγ., it would probably follow that verb, as ἐξ ὁδοῦ does, ref. Luke. I may add, that παραινομας occurs with a preposition and a substantive twelve times in the N. T. and in no case are they prefixed.—It would be useless to detail all the conjectures to which this history has given rise. From what has been written on the subject it would appear, (1) That ἀναρῶλαι may mean either Arabia, Persia, Chaldaea, or Parthia, with the provinces adjacent. See Judges vi. 3: Isa. xli. 2, xlii. 11: Num. xiii. 7. Philo (leg. ad Calum, p. 584) speaks of ἰβνὴ τὰ ἑβραῖα καὶ ἡγεμόνας αὐτῶν Παρθαίων. In all these countries there were magi, at least persons who in the wider sense of the word were now known by the name. The words in ver. 2 seem to point to some land not very near Judaea, as also the result of Herod's enquiry as to the date, shewn in ἀπὸ διευθ. (2) If we place together (α) the prophecy in Num. xxiv. 17, which could hardly be unknown to the Eastern astrologers,—and (β) the assertion of Suetonius (Vesp. c. 4), 'Percrebruerat Oriente toto vetus et constans opinio, esse in fatiis, ut eo tempore Judaea profecti rerum potirentur,'—and Tacitus, v. 13, 'Pluribus persuasio inerat, antiquis sacerdotum literis contineri, eo ipso tempore fore ut valesceret Oriens, profectique Judaea rerum potirentur,'—and (γ) the prophecy, also likely to be known in the East, of the seventy weeks in Daniel ix. 24:—we can, I think, be at no loss to understand how any remarkable celestial appearance at this time should have been interpreted as it was. (3) There is no ground for supposing the magi to have been three in number (as first, apparently, by Leo the Great, A.D. 460; "tribus igitur magis in regione Orientis stella novae claritatis apparuit," Serm. xxxi. p. 235, ed. Migne), or to have been kings. The first tradition appears to have arisen from the number of their gifts: the second, from the prophecy in Isa. lx. 3. (Tertulian seems to deduce it from the similar prophecy in Ps. lxxii. 10, "Reges Arabum et Saba munera afferent illi: nam et magos reges fere habuit Oriens," Adv. Jud. p. 619, ed. Migne; adv. Marc. p. 559, ed. Migne.) 2. αὐτοῦ τὸν ἀστέρα] [Much has been said and written on the following note in no friendly spirit; but, for the most part, in entire misunderstanding of its drift and character. It seems to me that the preliminary question for us is, Have we here in the sacred text a miracle, or have we some natural appearance which God in His Providence used as a means of indicating to the magi the birth of His Son? Different minds may feel differently as to the answer to this question: but I submit that it is not for any man to charge another, who is as firm a believer in the facts related in the sacred text as he himself can be, with weakening that belief, because he feels an honest conviction that it is here relating, not a miracle but a natural appearance. It is, of course, the far safer way, as far as reputation is concerned, to introduce miraculous agency wherever possible: but the present Editor aims at truth, not popularity. 1862.] This expression of the magi, we have seen his star, does not seem to point to any miraculous appearance, but to something observed in the course of their watching the heavens. We know the magi to have been devoted to astrology: and on comparing the language of our text with this undoubted fact, I confess that it appears to me the most ingenuous way, fairly to take account of that fact in our exegesis, and not to shelter ourselves from an apparent difficulty by the convenient but forced hypothesis of a miracle. Wherever supernatural agency is asserted, or may be reasonably inferred, I shall ever be found foremost to insist on its recognition, and impugn every device of rationalism or semi-rationalism; but it does not therefore follow that I should consent to attempts, however well meant, to introduce miraculous interference where it does not appear to be borne out by the narrative. The principle on which this commentary is conducted, is that of honestly endeavouring to ascertain the sense of the sacred text, without regard to any preconceived systems, and fearless of any possible consequences. And if the scientific or historical researches of others seem to contribute to this, my readers will find them, as far as they have fallen within my observation, made use of for that purpose. Now we learn from astronomical calculations, that a remarkable conjunction of the planets of our system took place a short time before the birth of our Lord. [I may premise, that the whole of the statements in this note have been remarkably confirmed, except in the detail now corrected, "that an ordinary eye would regard them (the planets) as one star of surpassing brightness," by the Rev. C. Pritchard, in a paper read by him before the Royal Astronomical Society, containing his calculations of the times and nearness of the conjunctions, as verified by the Astronomer Royal at Greenwich. The exact days and hours have been inserted below from Mr. Pritchard's paper.] In the year of Rome 747, on the 20th of May [29th, Pritchard], there was a conjunction of Jupiter and Saturn in the 20th degree of the constellation Pisces, close to the first point of Aries, which was the part of the heavens noted in astrological science as that in which the signs denoted the greatest and most noble events. On the 27th of October [29th Sept., Pritchard], in the same year, another conjunction of the same planets took place, in the 16th degree of Pisces: and on the 13th of November [5th Dec., Pritchard], a third, in the 15th degree of the same sign. (Ideler, Handbuch der Chronologie, ii. 399, sqq., also Winer, Realwörterbuch, under 'Stern der Weisen,' which see.) Supposing the magi to have seen the first of these conjunctions, they saw it actually in the East; for on the 29th of May it would rise 3½ hours before sunrise [Pritchard]. If they then took their journey, and arrived at Jerusalem in a little more than five months (the journey from Babylon took Ezra four months, see Ezra vii. 9), if they performed the route from Jerusalem to Bethlehem in the evening, as is implied, the December conjunction, in 15° of Pisces, would be before them in the direction of Bethlehem. ["1½ hour east of the meridian at sunset." Pritchard.] These circumstances would seem to form a remarkable coincidence with the history in our text. They are in no way inconsistent with the word ἀστέρα, which cannot surely (see below) be pressed to its mere literal sense of one single star, but understood in its wider astrological meaning: nor is this explanation of the star directing them to Bethlehem at all repugnant to the plain words of vv. 9, 10, importing its motion from s.e. towards s.w., the direction of Bethlehem. We may further observe, that no part of the text respecting the star, asserts, or even implies, a miracle; and that the very slight apparent inconsistencies with the above explanation are no more than the report of the magi themselves, and the general belief of the age would render unavoidable. If this subservience of the superstitions of astrology to the Divine purposes be objected to, we may answer with Wetstein, 'Superest igitur ut illos ex regulis artis suas habuisse existimemus: quæ licet certissime futilis, vana, atque fallax esset, casu tamen aliquando in verum incidere potuit. Admirabilis hinc elucet sapientia Dei, qui hominum erroribus et sceleribus usus Josephum per scelus fratrum in Ægyptum deduxit, regem Babelis per haruspicia et sortes Judæis immisit, (Ezech. xxi. 21, 22.) et magos hic per astrologiam ad Christum direxit.' —It may be remarked that Abarbanel the Jew, who knew nothing of this conjunction, relates it (Majne haschmah, cited by Münter in Ebrard, Wissensch. Kritik, p. 248) as a tradition, that no conjunction could be of mightier import than that of Jupiter and Saturn, which planets were in conjunction A.M. 2966, before the birth of Moses, in the sign of Pisces; and thence remarks that that sign was the most significant one for the Jews. From this consideration he concludes that the conjunction of these planets in that sign, in his own time (A.D. 1463), betokened the near approach of the birth of the Messiah. And as the Jews did not invent astrology, but learnt it from the Chaldeans, this idea, that a conjunction in Pisces betokened some great event in Judæa, must have prevailed among Chaldean astrologers. [It is fair to notice the influence on the position maintained in this note of the fact which Mr. Pritchard seems to have substantiated, that the planets did not, during the year B.C. 7, approach each other so as to be mistaken by any eye for one star: indeed not "within double the apparent diameter of the moon." I submit, that even if this were so, the inference in the note remains as it was. The conjunction of the two planets, complete or incomplete, would be that which would bear astrological significance, not their looking like one star. The two bright planets seen in the east,—the two bright planets standing over Bethlehem,—these would on each occasion have arrested the attention of the magi; and this appearance would have been denominated by them ὁ ἀσὴρ αὐτοῦ. To object that it is ἀσὴρ, not ἀστρον, is

Herod, as a foreigner and usurper, feared one who was born King of the Jews: the people, worn away by seditions and slaughters, feared fresh tumults and wars. There may also be a trace of the popular notion that the times of the Messiah would be ushered in by great tribulations: so Schöttgen, ii. p. 512, from the book Sohar, "quo tempore Sol redemptionis ipsis illucescet, tribulatio post tribulationem et tenebrae post tenebras venient ipsis: dum vero in his versantur, illucescet ipsis Lux Dei S. 4. συναγαγόν] i. e. says Lightfoot, he assembled the Sanhedrim. For the Sanhedrim consisting of seventy-one members, and comprising Priests, Levites, and Israelites (Maimonides), under the term ἀρχιερεῖς are contained the two first of these, and under γραμ. τ. λαοῦ the third. ἀρχ. are most likely the High Priest and those of his race,—any who had served the office,—and perhaps also the presidents of the twenty-four courses (1 Chron. xxiv. 6). γρ. consisted of the teachers and interpreters of the Divine law, the νομικοὶ and νομοδιδάσκαλοι of St. Luke. But the πρεσβύτεροι τοῦ λαοῦ are usually mentioned with these two classes as making up the Sanhedrim. See ch. xvi. 21; xxvi. 3, 59. Possibly on this occasion the ἀρχ. and γρ. only were summoned, the question being one of Scripture learning. "ἀρχιερεῖς," says Dr. Wordsworth, "is a word suggestive of the confusion now introduced into the nomination to the office of High Priest, when the true High Priest came from heaven to 'purify the sons of Levi' (Mal. iii. 3)." Instead of one High Priest for life, there were many, made and unmade in rapid succession. As Spanheim says, Dub. Evan. ii. 37, "ἀρχιερωσύνη confusa, Christo exhibitio. Summum sacerdotium pessime habitum, Herodis et Romanorum licentia." γεννᾶται.] The present tense is often used indefinitely of subjects of prophecy, e. g. ὁ ἰσχυόμενος, ch. xi. 3: Heb. x. 37; ἴσχυεται, in an expression exactly parallel to this, John vii. 42. 6. καὶ σὺ] This is a free paraphrase of the prophecy in Micah v. 2. It must be remembered that though the words are the answer of the Sanhedrim to Herod, and not a citation of the prophet by the Evangelist, yet they are

The tribes were divided into chiliads, and the names of the chiliads inscribed in the public records of their respective cities. In Judges vi. 15 Gideon says ἰδοὺ ἡ χιλιὰς μου ἡσθίνησιν ἐν Μανασσῇ, on which R. Kimchi (cited by Lightfoot) annotates, "Some understand Alphi to mean 'my father,' as if it were Aluphi, whose signification is 'prince or lord.'" And thus, it appears, did the Sanhedrim understand the word (which is the same) in Micah v. 2. The word χωι, without points, may mean either χωι, ἐν χιλιάσιν, or χωι, ἐν ἡγεμόσιν. ἐκ σου γὰρ ἐξ.] It has been remarked that the vulgar Latin expression, which occurs both in Tacitus and Suetonius (see the passages above in note on μάγοι ἀπ. ἀν.) 8. πορευθέντες . . . ἰλθόν] The pleonastic use of these words, common as a Hebraism in the N. T. Or it may even mean, 'over the whole town of Bethlehem.' If it is to be understood as standing over the houses, and thus indicating to the magi the position of the object of their search, the whole incident must be regarded as miraculous. But this is not necessarily implied, even if the words of the text be literally understood; and in a matter like astronomy, where popular language is so universally broad, and the Scriptures so generally use popular language, it is surely not the letter, but the spirit of the narrative with which we are concerned.

11. μετὰ Μαρίας] No stress must be laid on the omission of Joseph here. In the parallel account as regarded the shepherds, in Luke ii. 16, he is mentioned. I would rather regard the omission here as indicating a simple matter of fact, and contributing to shew the truthfulness of the narrative:—that Joseph happened not to be present at the time. If the meaning of την οικίαν is to be pressed (as in a matter of detail I think it should), it will confirm the idea that Joseph and Mary, probably under the idea that the child was to be brought up at Bethlehem, dwelt there some time after the Nativity. Epiphanius supposes that Mary was at this time on a visit to her kindred at Bethlehem (possibly at a passover) as much as two years after our Lord's birth. (Vol. i. pp. 48, 154, 430.) But if Mary had kindred at Bethlehem, how could she be so ill-provided with lodging, and have (as is implied in Luke ii. 7) sought accommodation at an inn? And the supposition of two years having elapsed, derived probably from the διεκοῦς of ver. 16, will involve us in considerable difficulty. There seems to be no reason why the magi may not have come within the forty days before the Purification, which itself may have taken place in the interval between their departure and Herod's discovery that they had mocked him. No objection can be raised to this view from the ἀπὸ διεκοῦς of ver. 16: see note there. The general idea is, that the Purification was previous to the visit of the magi. Being persuaded of the historic reality of these narratives of Matt. and Luke, we shall find no difficulty in also believing that, were we acquainted with all the events as they happened, their reconciliation would be an easy matter; whereas now the two independent accounts, from not being aware of, seem to exclude one another. This will often be the case in ordinary life; e. g. in the giving of evidence. And nothing can more satisfactorily shew the veracity and independence of the narrators, where their testimony to the main facts, as in the present case, is consentient. [I must caution the reader against the misunderstanding of these last remarks in Dean Ellcott's Lectures on the Life of our Lord, p. 70, note 4; and indeed of my own views as regards apparently irreconcilable narratives in the gospels, generally throughout his notes to that work.] θησαυροῦς] chests or bales, in which the gifts were carried during their journey. The ancient Fathers were fond of tracing in the gifts symbolical meanings: ὡς βασιλεῖ, τὸν χρυσόν. ὡς δὲ τοιῶντιν, τὴν σμύρναν. ὡς δὲ τοῖς, τὸν λίβαντον. Origen, ag. Celsus, p. 375, and similarly Irenæus, iii. 9. 2, p. 184:—χρυσὸν αὐτῶν γεννηθῆναι βασιλείας σύμβολον προσέκομισαν οἱ μάγοι. (Clem. Alex. p. 206, Potter.) We cannot conclude from these gifts that the magi came from Arabia,—as they were common to all the East. Strabo says, xvi. p. 1120, Wetst., that the best frankincense comes from the borders of Persia.

13. ἐγερθεῖς παρ.] Arise and take with thee; not, 'When thou hast arisen (in the morning), take.' The command was immediate; and Joseph made no delay. He must be understood, on account of νυκτός below, as having arisen the same night and departed forthwith. The words ἐγερθεῖς παρέλαβεν are also used in vv. 20, 21, where no haste is necessarily implied. Egypt, as near, as a Roman province and independent of Herod, and much inhabited by Jews, was an easy and convenient refuge. τοῦ ἀπολ. is not a Hebraism, but pure Greek, implying the purpose. See Soph. Trach. 57, and Hermann's note. Bernhardy, Syntax, p. 357, notices that it is rarely found in earlier Greek writers, but more common as we advance to the middle and later Attic. A few instances occur in Xenophon, more in Demosthenes, and abundance in after-writers. See on the usage, Winer, § 44. 4. b.

15. ἐξ Αἰγύπτου] This citation shews the almost universal application in the N. T. of the prophetic writings to the expected Messiah, as the general anti-type of all the events of the typical dispensation. We shall have occasion to remark the same again and again in the course of the Gospels. It seems to have been a received axiom of interpretation (which has, by its adoption in the N. T., received the sanction of the Holy Spirit Himself, and now stands for our guidance,) that the subject of all allusions, the represented in all parables and dark sayings, was He who was to come, or the circumstances attendant on His advent and reign.—The words are written in Hosea of the children of Israel, and are rendered from the Hebrew.—A similar expression with regard to Israel is found in Exod. iv. 22, 23.—[It must not be explained away: it never denotes the event or mere result, but always the purpose.

16.] Josephus makes no mention of this slaughter; nor is it likely that he would have done. Probably no great number of children perished in so small a place as Bethlehem and its neighbourhood. The modern objections to this narrative may be answered best by remembering the monstrous character of this tyrant, of whom Josephus asserts (Antt. xvii. 6. 6), μάλιστα χολῇ αὐτὸν ἦν ἐν πάσιν ἐξαγριαινοῦσα. Herod had marked the way to his throne, and his reign itself, with blood; had murdered his wife and three sons (the last just about this time); and was likely enough, in blind fury, to have made no enquiries, but given the savage order at once.—Besides, there might have been a reason for not making enquiry, but rather taking the course he did, which was sure, as he thought, to answer the end, without divulging the purpose. The word λάθρα in ver. 7 seems to favour this view.—Macrobius (Saturnalia, ii. 4) relates an anecdote of Augustus: 'Cum audisset inter pueros quos in Syria Herodes rex Judæorum intra bimatum jussit interfici, filium quoque ejus occisum, ait, Melius est Herodis porcum esse (τὸν ἔν?) quam filium (τὸν υἱόν?).' But Macrobius wrote in the fifth century, and the words 'intra bimatum' look very like a quotation from our narrative. Besides, the anecdote shews great ignorance of the chronology of Herod's reign. Antipater, the last put to death of his sons, was of full age at his execution. See Ellicott's note, Lectures, p. 78. ἐνεπαίχθη] 'Loquitur Matth., ex sensu et opinione Herodis.' (Calvin.)

ἐπὶ διυτιῶν] i. e. παιδίου, not taken as any very certain indication of the time when the star did actually ap-

that there was uncertainty in Herod's mind as to the age pointed out; and if so, why might not the jealous tyrant, although he had accurately ascertained the date of the star's appearing, have taken a

Apparently, an accommodation of the pro-distinction between τότε ἐπληρώθη and ἵνα πληρωθῇ, but rather seek our explanation in the acknowledged system of prophetic interpretation among the Jews, still extant in their rabbinical books, and now sanctioned to us by N. T. usage; at the same time remembering, for our caution, how little even now we understand of the full bearing of prophetic and typical words and acts. None of the expressions of this prophecy must be closely and literally pressed. The link of connexion seems to be Rachel's sepulchre, which (Gen. xxxv. 19: see also 1 Sam. x. 2) was 'in the way to Bethlehem;' and from that circumstance, perhaps, the inhabitants of that place are called her children. We must also take into account the close relation between the tribes of Judah and Benjamin, which had long subsisted. Ramah was six miles to the north of Jerusalem, in the tribe of Benjamin (Jer. xl.

1: "Er-Ram, marked by the village and green patch on its summit, the most conspicuous object from a distance in the approach to Jerusalem from the South, is certainly 'Ramah of Benjamin.'" Stanley, ance, in speaking of the dead;" but perhaps a citation from Exod. iv. 19, where the same words are spoken to Moses (ζητεῖν τὴν ψυχὴν = ψῆψ ψ23): or, as Meyer, betokening, not the number, but the category. 22. ἀκούσας 24] ARCHELAUS was the son of Herod by Malthace, a Samaritan woman: he was brought up at Rome (Jos. B. J. i. 81. 1); succeeded his father, but never had the title of king, only that of Ethnarch, with the government of Idumæa, Judæa, and Samaria, the rest of his father's dominions being divided between his brothers Philip and Antipas. (Jos. Antt. xvii. 11. 4.) But, (1) very likely the word βασιλεύει is here used in the wider meaning:—(2) Archelaus did, in the beginning of his reign, give out and regard himself as king: τὸ πλῆθος . . . ἐνχαριστοῖ . . . τῆς πρὸς αὐτὸν θειραπείας ὡς πρὸς βίβαιον ἡδὴ βασιλεία (Jos. B. J. ii. 1. 1): (3) in ch. xiv. 9, Herod the Tetrarch is called ὁ βασιλεύς.—In the ninth year of his government Archelaus was dethroned, αὐ μόνον 'Ιουδαίαις, ἀλλὰ καὶ Σαμαρείταις χρησάμενος ὡμοῖς, πρεσβευσαμένων ἑκατέρων εἰς αὐτοῦ πρὸς Καίσαρα, . . . φυγαδίζεται μὴ εἰς Βιθυνίαν πόλιν τῆς Γαλιτίας . . . i. e. Vienna, in Gaul. (Ibid. ii. 7. 8.)

ἀνεχώρησεν εἰς τ. π. τ. Γαλ.] This account gives rise to some difficulty as compared with St. Luke's history. It would certainly, on a first view, appear that this Evangelist was not aware that Nazareth had been before this the abode of Joseph and Mary.

VOL. I.

And it is no real objection to this, that he elsewhere calls Nazareth τὴν πατρίδα αὐτοῦ, ch. xiii. 54, 57. It is perhaps just possible that St. Matthew, writing for Jews, although well aware of the previous circumstances, may not have given them a place in his history, but made the birth at Bethlehem the prominent point, seeing that his account begins at the birth (ch. i. 18), and does not localize what took place before it, which is merely inserted as subservient to that great leading event. If this view be correct, all we could expect is, that his narrative would contain nothing inconsistent with the facts related in Luke; which we find to be the case.—I should prefer, however, believing, as more consistent, in foro conscientie, with the fair interpretation of our text, that St. Matthew himself was not aware of the events related in Luke i. ii., and wrote under the impression that Bethlehem was the original dwelling-place of Joseph and Mary. Certainly, had we only his Gospel, this inference from it would universally be made.—ἀνεχώρησεν must not be pressed (as Wordsw., al.) into the service of reconciling the two accounts by being rendered 'returned;' for the same word is used (ver. 14) of the journey to Egypt.

23. ὅπως πληρωθῇ] These words refer to the divine purpose in the event, not to that of Joseph in bringing it about.

τὸ ῥηθὲν 8. τ. π.] These words are no where verbatim to be found, nor is this asserted by the Evangelist; but that the sense of the prophets is such. In searching for such sense, the following hypotheses have been made—none of them satisfactory:—(1) Euthymius says, τοῖς προφήταις τοῦτο εἶπον, μὴ ζητήσης· οὕχ

But the expression διὰ τ. πρ. seems to have a wider bearing than is thus implied. (2) The general sense of the prophets is, that Christ should be a despised person, as the inhabitants of Nazareth were (John i. 47). So Michaelis, Paulus, Rosenm., Kuin., Olah., &c. But surely this part of the Messiah's prophetic character is not general or prominent enough, in the absence of any direct verbal connexion with the word in our text, to found such an interpretation on: nor, on the other hand, does it appear that an inhabitant of Nazareth, as such, was despised; only that the obscurity of the town was, both by Nathanael and the Jews, contrasted with our Lord's claims. (3) The Nazarites of old were men holy and consecrated to God; e. g. Samson (Judg. xiii. 5), Samuel (1 Sam. i. 11), and to this the words are referred by Tert., Jerome, Erasm., Beza, Calvin, Grot., Wetst., al. But (a) our Lord did not (like John the Baptist) lead a life in accordance with the Nazarite vow, but drank wine, &c., and set himself in marked contrast with John in this very particular (ch. xi. 18, 19); and (β) the word for Nazarite is Naẓir (Judg. xiii. 5 vat.), or Naẓiraios (ib. and xvi. 18 F.—Lam. iv. 7), whereas this, denoting an inhabitant of Nazareth, is Naẓaraios always in the N. T., except in Mark (i. 24; x. 47; xiv. 67; xvi. 6), and Luke iv. 43 (xviii. 37, xxiv. 19 v. r.), where it is Naẓarηνός. (4) There may be an allusion to נָזַר, a branch, by which name our Lord is called in Isa. xi. 1, and from which word it appears that the name Nazareth is probably derived. So 'eruditi Hebraei,' in Jerome on Isa. xi. 1, and Pisc., Casaub., Fritz., De Wette, &c. But this word is only used in the place cited; and in by far the more precise prophecies of the Branch, Zech. iii. 8; vi. 12: Jer. xxiii. 5; xxxiii. 15, and Isa. iv. 2, the word נָזַר is used.—I leave it, therefore, as an unsolved difficulty.

CHAP. III. 1—12.] PREACHING AND

BAPTISM OF JOHN. Mark i. 1—8: Luke iii. 1—17. Here the synoptic narrative begins, its extent being the same as that specified by Peter in Acts i. 22, 'from the baptism of John unto that same day that He was taken up from us.' For a critical comparison of the narratives in the various sections, see notes on St. Mark. In this Gospel, I have generally confined myself to the subject matter. 1. ἐν δὲ ταῖς ἡμ. &c.] The last matter mentioned was the dwelling at Nazareth: and though we must not take the connexion strictly as implying that Joseph dwelt there all the intermediate thirty years, the ἡμέραις ἐκείναις must be understood to mean that we take up the persons of the narrative where we left them; i. e. dwelling at Nazareth. See Exod. ii. 11, LXX. [παραγίνεται.] Comes forward—'makes his appearance.' Buthym. asks the question, πῶθεν; and answers it, ἀπὸ τῆς ἐνδοτίσας ἐρήμου. But this can hardly be, owing to the ἐν τῇ ἐρήμῳ following. The verb is used absolutely. The title Ἰω. ὁ βαπτ. shows that St. Matthew was writing for those who well knew John the Baptist as an historical personage. Josephus, in mentioning him (Antt. xviii. 5. 2), calls him Ἰωάννης ὁ ἐπικαλούμενος βαπτιστής.—John was strictly speaking a prophet; belonging to the legal dispensation; a rebuker of sin, and preacher of repentance. The expression in St. Luke, ἐγένετο ῥῆμα θεοῦ ἐπὶ Ἰωάννῃν, is the usual formula for the Divine commission of the Prophets (Jer. i. 1: Ezek. vi. 1; vii. 1, &c.). And the effect of the Holy Spirit on John was more in accordance with the O. T. than the N. T. inspiration; more of a sudden overpowering influence, as in the Prophets, than a gentle indwelling manifested through the individual character, as in the Apostles and Evangelists.—The baptism of John was of a deeper significance than that usual among the Jews in the case of proselytes, and formed an integral part of his divinely appointed office. It was emphatically the baptism of repentance (λουτρὸν μετάνοις, says Olshausen [cf. Luke iii. 3], but not λουτρὸν καλῆς συνείσεως. Titus iii. 5). We find in Acts xviii. 24—26; xix. 1—7, accounts of persons who had received the baptism of John, who believed and (in Apollos's case) taught accurately the things (i. e. facts) concerning the Lord; but required instruction (in doctrine) and rebaptizing in the name of the Lord Jesus. Whether the baptism practised by the disciples before the Resurrection was of the same kind, and required this renewal, is uncertain. The fact of our Lord Himself having received baptism from John, is decisive against the identity of the two rites, as also against the idea (Olah. i. 154, note) derived from Acts xix. 4, that John used the formula βαπτίζω σε εἰς τὸν ἱερόμενον. His whole mission, as Olah. well observes, was calculated, in accordance with the office of the law which gives the knowledge of sin (Rom. iii. 20), to bring men's minds into that state in which the Redeemer invites them (ch. xi. 28), as weary and heavy laden, to come to him.

ἐν τῇ ἐρήμῳ] Where also he had been brought up, Luke i. 80. This tract was not strictly a desert, but thinly peopled, and abounding in pastures for flocks. Josephus, B. J. iii. 10. 7, says, that the Jordan διατίμνει τὴν Γεννησάρ μίσην, ἔπειτα πολλὴν ἀναμετρούμενος ἱερμίας εἰς τὴν Ἀσφαλτίτιν ἕξεισι λίανην. See Judg. i. 18: 1 Kings ii. 34. This ἱερμός answers to πᾶσα περίχωρος τοῦ ἱερδάνου in Luke iii. 3. See note on ch. iv. 1.

2. μετανοεῖτε] Used by the Baptist in the O. T. sense of turning to God as His people, from the spiritual idolatry and typical adultery in which the faithless among the Jews were involved. This, of course, included personal amendment in individuals. See Luke iii. 10—14. Josephus describes John, Antt. xviii. 5. 2, as τοὺς Ἰουδαίους κελύοντα ἀρετὴν ἱεραστῶντας καὶ τῇ πρὸς ἀλλήλους δικαιοσύνῃ καὶ πρὸς τὸν θεὸν εὐσεβείᾳ χωρῖνον βαπτισμῷ συνίναι.

ἡ βασιλεία τῶν οὐρανῶν] An expression peculiar in the N. T. to St. Matthew. The more usual one is ἡ βασι. τοῦ θεοῦ: but ἡ β. τῶν οὐρ. is common in the Rabbinical writers, who do not however, except in one or two places, mean by it the reign of the Messiah, but the Jewish religion—the theocracy. Still, from the use of it by St. Matthew here, and in ch. iv. 17; x. 7, we may conclude that it was used by the Jews, and understood, to mean the advent of the Christ, probably from the prophecy in Dan. ii. 44; vii. 13, 14, 27.—It has been observed by recent critics, that wherever the term βασι. r. οὐρ. (or its equivalent) is used in the N. T., it signifies, not the Church, nor the Christian religion, but strictly the kingdom of the Messiah which is to be revealed hereafter. I should doubt this being exclusively true. The state of Christian men now is undoubtedly a part of the bringing in of the kingdom of Christ, and, as such, is included in this term. See Mark xii. 34, and note on ch. v. 3.

3. οὗτος γάρ ἐστιν] Not the words of the Baptist, meaning ὁὗτος γάρ ἐγώ, as in John i. 23, but of the Evangelist; and ἐστιν is not for ἦν, but is the prophetic present, representing to us the place which the Baptist fills in the divine purposes. Of γάρ, Bengel says well, “Causa cur Johannes ita exoriri tum debuerit uti ver. 1, 2 describitur, quia sic praedictum erat.” The words ἐν τῇ ἐρήμῳ belong in the Hebrew to εἰτοιμάσατε, but in the LXX and here to βοῶντος.—The primary and literal application of this prophecy to the return from captivity is very doubtful. If it ever had such an application, we may safely say that its predictions were so imperfectly and sparingly fulfilled in that return, or any thing which followed it, that we are necessarily directed onward to its greater fulfilment—the announcement of the kingdom of Christ. Euthymius remarks, οὐδὲν δὲ κυρίου καὶ τριβύνας αὐτοῦ καλεῖ τὰς ψυχὰς, ὧν ἐπιβαίνειν ἐμελλεν ὁ λόγος τοῦ εὐαγγελίου, ἃς καὶ προερίπτεται ἰτοιμάζων, ἡγουν καθαιρὼν, τῇ ἰσχυρίᾳ τῆς μετανοίας ἀνασπῶντας μὲν τὰς ἀπάντας τῶν παθῶν, ἐκρίπτοντας δὲ τοὺς λίθους τῆς ἀμαρτίας, καὶ οὕτως εὐθείας καὶ ὁμαλὰς αὐτὰς ἀπαργάζεσθαι πρὸς ὑποδοχὴν αὐτοῦ. 4. αὐτὸς δὲ ὁ Ἰω. αὐτὸς recalls the reader from the prophetic testimony, to the person of John: now John himself. . . . As John was the Elias of prophecy, so we find in his outward attire a striking similarity to Elias, who was ἀνὴρ δασύς, καὶ ζωνὴν δερματίνην περιζωσμένος τὴν ὀσφύν αὐτοῦ. 4 Kings i. 8. The garment of camel's hair was not the camel's skin with the hair on, which would be too heavy to wear, but raiment woven of camel's hair, such as Josephus speaks of (B. J. i. 24. 3), ἰσθητὶς ἐκ τριχῶν πεποιημένη, as a contrast to ἰσθ. βασιλικαί. From Zech. xiii. 4, it seems that such a dress was known as the prophetic garb: 'neither shall they (the prophets) wear a rough garment (διῆρὴν τριχίνην, LXX, who, however, make it a garment of penitence for having deceived) to deceive.' ἀκρίδες] There is no difficulty here. The ἀκρίς, permitted to be eaten, ref. Levit., was used as food by the lower orders in Judæa, and mentioned by Strabo and Pliny as eaten by the Æthiopians, and by many other authors as articles of food. Jerome, adv. Jovinian. ii. 6, says, "Apud Orientales et Libyæ populos quia per desertam et calidam eremi vastitatem locustarum nubes reperiuntur, locustis vesci moris est: hoc verum esse Joannes quoque Baptistæ probat." Shaw found locusts eaten by the Moors in Barbary. (Travels, p. 184.) Epiphanius, Her. xxx. p. 188, quotes this from the Gospel according to the Ebionites as follows: καὶ τὸ βρώμα αὐτοῦ μέλι ἄγριον, οὗ ἡ γένσις ἦν τοῦ μάννου, ὡς ἔγερσις ἐν ἰλαίῳ, and adds, ἵνα δῃθεν μεταστρίψωσι τὸν τῆς ἀληθείας λόγον εἰς ψεύδος, καὶ ἀντὶ ἀκριδων ποιήσωσιν ἐγ-κρίδας ἐν μέλιτι. μέλι ἄγριον] See

1 Sam. xiv. 25. Here, again, there is no need to suppose any thing else meant but honey made by wild bees; τὸ ἐν ταῖς τῶν πετρῶν σχισμαῖς ὑπὸ τῶν μελισσῶν γεωργοῦμενον. Euthym. Schulz (cited by Winer, Realw., and De Wette) found such honey in this very wilderness in our own time. See Psalm lxxxi. 16: Judg. xiv. 8: Deut. xxxii. 13. The passage usually cited from Diodorus Siculus (xix. 94) to shew that μέλι ἄγριον exuded from trees, does not necessarily imply it; φέρεται γὰρ παρ' αὐτοῖς τὸ πίεσις ἀπὸ τῶν δένδρων, καὶ μέλι πολλὸν τὸ καλούμενον ἄγριον, ὃ χρῶνται ποτὶ μὲθ' ὕδατος. Suidas certainly makes it a gum: μ. ἀγ. ὅπερ ἀπὸ τῶν δένδρων ἐπισυναγόμενον, μάννα τοῖς πολλοῖς προσγορεύεται. And Meyer prefers this view, on account of the predicate ἄγριον, which, he says, is a terminus technicus, pointing out this particular kind of honey. But he does not give any authority for this assertion: and it seems just as likely that ἄγριον might be applied to it as made by wild bees.

5. τότε ἔξεν.] The latter καὶ here has been supposed to mean 'especially,' seeing that Judæa was part of the περιχώρος; as in the expression ἄλλως τε καί. But the former καὶ πᾶσα will hardly allow this. καὶ πᾶσα ἡ περ. means all the neighbourhood of Jordan not included in Jerusalem and Judæa before mentioned. Parts of Peræa, Samaria, Galilee, and Gaulonitis come under this denomination. —There need be no surprise at such multitudes going out to John. The nature of his announcement, coupled with the prevalent expectation of the time, was enough to produce this effect. See, as strictly consistent with this account, chap. xi. 7—15. 6. ἐβαπτίζοντο] When men τὰ ὑποδ. βαστάσαι.] Lightfoot (from Maimonides) shews that it was the token of a slave having become his master's property, to loose his shoe, to tie the same, or to carry the necessary articles for him to the bath. The expressions therefore in all the Gospels amount to the same.

 ἐν πν. ἁγ. καὶ πυρὶ.] This was literally fulfilled at the day of Pentecost: but Origen and others refer the words to the baptism of the righteous by the Holy Spirit, and of the wicked by fire. I have no doubt that this (which I am surprised to see upheld by Neander, De Wette, and Meyer) is a mistake in the present case, though apparently (to the superficial reader) borne out by ver. 12. The double symbolic reference of fire, elsewhere found,
 e. g. Mark ix. 50, as purifying the good and consuming the evil, though illustrated by these verses, is hardly to be pressed into the interpretation of πυρὶ in this verse, the prophecy here being solely of that higher and more perfect baptism to which that of John was a mere introduction. To separate off πν. ἁγίῳ as belonging to one set of persons, and πυρὶ as belonging to another, when both are united in ὑμᾶς, is in the last degree harsh, besides introducing confusion into the whole. The members of comparison in this verse are strictly parallel to one another: the baptism by water, the end of which is μεράνεια, a mere transition state, a note of preparation,—and the baptism by the Holy Ghost and fire, the end of which is (ver. 12) sanctification, the entire aim and purpose of man's creation and renewal. So Chrys.: τῇ ἐκτεγγήσει τοῦ πυρὸς πάλιν τὸ σφοδρὸν καὶ ἀκάθαρτον τῆς χάριτος ἰνδαικνύμενος. Thus the official superiority of the Redeemer (which is all that our Evangelist here deals with) is fully brought out. The superiority of nature and pre-existence is reserved for the fuller and more dogmatic account in John i. 12. οὐ τὸ πτόν] οὐ... αὐτοῦ, a very common redundancy. See reff.

 οὐ is not 'whose,' which is implied in ρό:
 it belongs (against Meyer) to χειρὶ, not to πτόν, and the sense is just as if it had stood, οὐ ἐν τῇ χειρὶ αὐτοῦ τὸ πτόν.
 In the Rabbinical work Midrash Tehillim, on Ps. ii., is found: 'Advenit tritratatio, stramen projiciunt in ignem, paleam in ventum, sed triticum conservant in area:
 sic nationes mundi erunt sicut conflogra-tio furni: ast Israel conservabitur solus.' (Quoted by Lightfoot on John iii. 17.)

 trodden space in the middle of the field.

 where there is an illustration. "Very little use is now made of the fan, but I have seen it employed to purge the floor of the refuse dust, which the owner throws away as useless." p. 540. ἄχυρον]

13—17.] JESUS HIMSELF BAPTIZED BY HIM. Mark i. 9—11: Luke iii. 21, 22. It does not appear exactly when the baptism of our Lord took place. If the comparative age of the Baptist is taken into account, we should suppose it to have been about six months after this latter began his ministry. But this is no sure guide. The place was Bethany (the older reading), beyond Jordan; John i. 28. 13. τοῦ βαπτ.] Why should our Lord, who was without sin, have come to a baptism of repentance? Because He was made sin for us: for which reason also He suffered the curse of the law. It became Him, being in the likeness of sinful flesh, to go through those appointed rites and purifications which belonged to that flesh. There is no more strangeness in His having been baptized by John, than in His keeping the Passovers. The one rite, as the other, belonged to sinners—and among the transgressors He was numbered. The prophetic words in Ps. xl. 12, spoken in the person of our Lord, indicate, in the midst of sinlessness, the most profound apprehension of the sins of that nature which He took upon him. I cannot suppose the baptism to have been sought by our Lord merely to honour John (Kuinöel), or as knowing that it would be the occasion of a divine recognition of his Messiahship (Paulus), and thus preordained by God (Meyer): but bona fide, as bearing the infirmities and carrying the sorrows of mankind, and thus beginning here the triple baptism of water, fire, and blood, two parts of which were now accomplished, and of the third of which He himself speaks, Luke xii. 50, and the beloved Apostle, 1 John v. 8, where πνεῦμα = πῦρ.—His baptism, as it was our Lord's closing act of obedience under the Law, in His hitherto concealed life of legal submission, His πληρῶσαι πᾶσ. δικ., so was His solemn inauguration and anointing for the higher official life of mediatorial satisfaction which was now opening upon Him. See Rom. i. 3, 4. We must not forget that the working out of perfect righteousness in our flesh by the entire and spotless keeping of God's law (Deut. vi. 25), was, in the main, accomplished during the thirty years previous to our Lord's official ministry.

14. διεκώλυεν] A much stronger word than καλύω, implying the active and earnest preventing, with the gesture or hand, or voice, as here. The imperfect tense conveys, not that he endeavoured merely to hinder Him (see Hermann's note on Soph. Ajax, 1106), but began to hinder Him, was hindering Him.—There is only an apparent inconsistency between the speech of John in this sense, and the assertion made by him in John i. 33, 'I knew him not.' Let us regard the matter in this light:—John begins his ministry by a commission from God, who also admonishes him, that He, whose Forerunner he was, would be in time revealed to him by a special sign. Jesus comes to be baptized by him. From the nature of his relationship to our Lord, he could not but know those events which had accompanied his birth, and his subsequent life of holy and unblameable purity and sanctity. My impression from the words of this verse certainly is, that he regarded Him as the Messiah. Still, his belief wanted that full and entire assurance which the occurrence of the predicted sign gave him, which the word ᾄδειν implies, and which would justify him in announcing Him to his disciples as the Lamb of God. See the ancient opinions in Maldonatus's note.

15. ἀποκριθεὶς] Dr. Wordsworth remarks, on this, the first occurrence of this very common form, that it is stigmatized by the grammarians as a solecism. The passage is in Phrynichus, Eclog. ed. Lobeck, p. 106, — ἀποκριθῆναι δεῦτόν ἀμάρτημα. ἰδοὶ γὰρ λίγειν ἀποκρίνασθαι, καὶ εἰδέναι ὅτι τὸ διαχωρισθῆναι σημαίνει, ὥστε οὐκ καὶ τὸ ἐναντίον αὐτοῦ, τὸ συκριθῆναι, εἰς τὴν καὶ ταύτην ἰδέσθαι. εἰδὼς οὖν τοῦτο, ἐπὶ μὲν τὸ ἀποδοῦναι τὴν ἐπερώτησιν, ἀποκρίνωσθαι λίγῃ, ἐπὶ δὲ τοῦ διαχωρισθῆναι, τὸ ἀποερεθῆναι. [ἀπρ.] The exact meaning is difficult. It cannot well be that which the E. V. at first sight gives, that something was to be done now, inconsistent with the actual and hereafter-to-be-manifested relation of the two persons. Rather — though what has been said (ver. 14) is true, yet the time is not come for that: — as yet, ἀπρ., now, are we in another relation (viz. our Lord as the fulfiller of the law, John as a minister of it), therefore suffer it. So Chrysostom: οὐ διηκνῶς ταῦτα ἵσταται, ἀλλ' ἔφη μὲ ἐν τούτοις εἰς ἐπιθυμίαις ἀπρὶ μόντοις ὑπάρχοντων τοῦτο (Hom. xii. p. 161). 'This ἀπρ. is spoken from the Lord's foreknowledge, that this relation of subjection to John was only temporary, and that hereafter their relative situations would be inverted.' Meyer. Stier remarks (Reden Jesu, vol. i. p. 14, edn. 2), that now was fulfilled the prophetic announcement of Ps. xl. 7, 8. [ἀπρ.] not for me, but for mei soli soli. I cannot help thinking that this word glances at the relationship and previous acknowledged destinations of the speakers. It has however a wider sense, as spoken by Him who is now first coming forth officially as the Son of Man extending over all those whose baptism plants them in his likeness, Rom. vi. See Stier, ibid.

δικαιοσύνην] requirements of the law. See ch. vi. 1, where the sense is general, as here.

16. βαπτισθεὶς] On this account I would make the following remarks. (1) The appearance and voice seem to have been manifested to our Lord and the Baptist only. They may have been alone at the time: or, if not, we have an instance in Acts ix. 7, of such an appearance being confined to one person, while the others present were unconscious of it. We can hardly however, with some of the Fathers, say, that it was πνευματικὴ θεωρία. — or ὁρασία, οὐ φῶς τὸ φαινόμενον, Theod. Mopsuest., — or 'Aperiuntur celi non resurrectione elementorum, sed spiritualibus oculis, quibus et Ezechiel in principio voluminis sui apertos eos esse commemorat.' Jerome in loc. (2) The Holy Spirit descended not only in the manner of a dove, but σωματικῶς εἶδεν (|| Luke): which I cannot understand in any but the literal sense, as THE BODILY SHAPE OF A DOVE, seen by the Baptist. There can be no objection to this, the straightforward interpretation of the narrative, which does not equally apply to the Holy Spirit being visible at all, which John himself asserts Him to have been (John i. 82—84), even more expressly than is asserted here. Why the Creator Spirit may not have assumed an organized body bearing symbolical meaning, as well as any other material form, does not seem clear. This was the ancient, and is the only honest interpretation. All the modern explanations of the ὡς ὁ περιστερ. as importing the manner of coming down, belong, as Meyer has rightly remarked, to the vain rationalistic attempt to reduce down that which is miraculous. The express assertion of Luke, and the fact that all four Evangelists have used the same expression, which they would not have done if it were a mere tertium comparationis, are surely a sufficient refutation of this rationalizing (and, I may add, blundering) interpretation.

εἶδεν belongs to ἀνέβη, not to βαπτ., nor to ἀνέψυχθ. It is the first member of the conjunctive clause of which καὶ ἰδοὺ is the second—as we say, the moment that Jesus was gone up out of the water, behold. (3) Two circumstances may be noticed respecting the manner of the descent of the Spirit: (a) it was, as a dove: — the Spirit as manifested in our Lord was gentle and benign. Lord Bacon (Meditationes Sacrae, cited in Trench on the Miracles, p. 37) remarks: — "Moses edidit miracula, et proffugavit Aegyptios pestibus multis: Elias edidit, et occulavit coelum ne plueret super terram: Eliseus edidit, et evocavit urnas de deserto quae laniarent impuberes: Petrus Ananiam sacrilegum hypocritam morte, Paulus Elymam magnum cecitate percussit: sed nihil huiusmodi fecit Jesus. Descendit super eum Spiritus in forma columbe, de quo dixit, Nescitis ejus Spiritus sitis. Spiritus Jesu, spiritus columbinus: fuerunt illi servi Dei tanquam boves Dei triturantes granum, et conculcantes paleam: sed Jesus agnus Dei sine ira et judicii." On the history of this symbol for the Holy Spirit, see Lücke's Comm. on John, vol. i. 425. (β) This was not a sudden and temporary descent of the Spirit, but a permanent though special anointing of the Saviour for his holy office. It 'abode upon Him,' John i. 32. And from this moment His ministry and mediatorial work (in the active official sense) begins. εὐθὺς, the Spirit carries Him away to the wilderness: the day of His return thence (possibly; but see notes on John i. 29) John points Him out as the Lamb of God: then follows the calling of Andrew, Peter, Philip, and Nathanael, and the third day after is the first miracle at the marriage in Cana. But we must not imagine any change in the nature or person of our Lord to have taken place at his baptism. The anointing and crowning are but signs of the official assumption of the power which the king has by a right independent of, and higher than these. (4) The whole narrative is in remarkable parallelism with that of the Transfiguration. There we have our Lord supernaturally glorified in the presence of two great prophetic personages, Moses and Elias, who speak of His decease,—on the journey to which He forthwith sets out (ch. xvii. 22, compared with xix. 1); and accompanied by the same testimony of the voice from heaven, uttering the same words, with an addition accordant with the truth then symbolized. (5) In connexion with apocryphal additions, the following are not without interest: καταθρόνος τοῦ Ἰησοῦ ἐπὶ τὸ ὕδωρ, καὶ πῦρ ἀνέφθη ἐν τῷ Ἰορδάνῃ καὶ ἀναδένοντας αὐτοῦ ἀπὸ τοῦ ὕδατος κ.τ.λ. Justin Martyr, Dial. § 88, p. 185. The author of the tract 'de Rebaptismate,' among the works of Cyprian, blames the spurious book called 'Petri Prædicatione,' for relating, among other things, of Christ, "cum baptizaretur, ignem super aquam esse visam, quod in evangelio nullo est scriptum." (ch. ix.) The Ebionite gospel, according to Epiphanius, Hæc. xxx. p. 138, added, after ἐν ᾧ εὐδόκησα,—ἐγὼ σήμερον γαίνυνται σε. καὶ εὐθὺς περιλαμψε τὸν τόπον φῶς μέγα. ἐν ᾧ δὲ ὁ Ἰωάννης λέγει αὐτῷ Σὺ τίς εἰ κύρις; καὶ πάλιν φωνὴ ἐξ οὐρανοῦ πρὸς αὐτόν οὗτός ἐστιν ὁ υἱός μου ὁ ἀγαπητός, εἰς δὲ ἡυδόκησα. καὶ τότε ὁ Ἰω. προσεσὼν αὐτῷ ἔλεγε Διδομαι σου κύρις, σύ με βάπτισον. ὁ δὲ ἐκάλειν αὐτῷ λίγων Ἀρεῖς, ὅτι οὕτως ἐστὶ πρέπον πληρωθῆναι πάντα. Jerome gives the following opening of the narrative from the gospel according to the Hebrews: "Ecce mater domini et fratres ejus dicebant ei Joannes baptista baptizavit in remissionem peccatorum: eamus et baptizemur ab eo. Dixit autem eis Quid peccavi ut vadam et baptizer ab eo? nisi forte hoc ipsum quod dixi ignorantia est."

ἑαυτον ἐταλν.] Then probably not during the time itself. The period of the fast, as in the case of Moses, was spent in a spiritual ecstasy, during which the wants of the natural body were suspended.

3. καὶ προσελθόν.] From the words of both St. Mark and St. Luke, it appears that our Lord was tempted also during the forty days. Whether the words of St. Mark, ἦν μετὰ τῶν θηρίων, allude to one kind of temptation, is uncertain: see note on Mark i. 13.—The word προσελθ. need not be understood of the first approach, but the first recorded—at a certain time the tempter approaching, &c.

ὁ πειράζων, 'the tempter.' Here first we find the N. T. meaning of πειράζειν, to solicit to sin, which does not occur in the LXX, nor in the classics. The use of the pres. part. with the art., as denoting employ, or office, is very common. See, among other places, John iv. 36, 37, and ch. xiii. 3, xxvi. 46, 48. Cf. Winer, § 18. 3.

et] νομιζων ὑποκρίσκειν αὐτὸν τοῖς ἰγυμνίαις, Chrys. Or, as Euthymius, ὡς οὗτοι παρακινεῖσθαι τῷ λόγῳ, καθάπερ οὐκιδασθαίς ἐπὶ τῷ μὴ εἶναι υἱὸς θεοῦ. At all events, there is no doubt expressed, as Wolf and Bengel think.

υἱὸς τοῦ θεοῦ] In the N. T. are found three combinations of these two substantives and the article, and all with one and the same meaning, viz. THE SON or GOD, in the highest and Messianic sense. (1) The expression in the text, of which our Lord says, John x. 36, ὃν ὁ Πατὴρ ἡγάσεν καὶ ἀπέστειλεν εἰς τὸν κόσμον ὅμις λιγυτε ὅτι βλασφημία ἐστι εἶπεν ὅτι υἱὸς τοῦ θεοῦ εἰμι; see also Matt. xxvii. 40.—(2) ὁ υἱὸς τοῦ θ. In John ix. 35, we read, σὺ πιστεύεις εἰς τὸν υἱὸν τοῦ θεοῦ; ὁ λαλῶν μετὰ σου ἐκείνός ἐστιν.—(3) υἱὸς θ. In Luke i. 35, τὸ γεννώμενον ἄγιον κληθήσεται υἱὸς θεοῦ. See also ch. xxvii. 64 (|| Mk.), and notes there and on Luke xxiii. 47. 4.]

Our Lord does not give way to the temptation, so as to meet him with an open declaration, 'I am the Son of God:' thus indeed He might have asserted his Lordship over him, but not have been his Conqueror for us. The first word which He uses against him, reaches far deeper: 'Man shall not live,' &c. "This, like the other text, is taken from the history of Israel's temptation in the wilderness: for Israel represents, in a foreshadowing type, the Son of Man, the servant of God for Righteousness, the one ἰσχυόμενος, in whom alone that nature which in all men has degenerated into sin, πληροὶ πάσαις δικαιοσύνην. Adam stood not,—Israel according to the flesh stood not,—when the Lord their God tempted them: but rather, after Satan's likeness, tempted their God: but now the second Adam is come, the true Israel, by whose obedience the way of life is again made known and opened—'that man truly liveth on and in the eternal word of God.'" Stier's Reden Jesu, vol. i. p. 16 (edn. 2). Observe also how our Lord resists Satan in His humanity; at once here numbering Himself with men, by adducing ὁ ἄνθρωπος as including His own case; and not only so, but thus speaking out the mystery of his humiliation, in which He had foregone his divine Power, of his own will.—By 'every word' (or 'thing,' for ῥῆμα is not expressed in the original) that proceedeth out of the mouth of God,' we must understand, every arrangement of the divine will; God, who ordinarily sustains by bread, can, if it please Him, sustain by any other means, as in the case alluded to. Compare John iv. 32, 34.

probably given to the tempter over the person of our Lord. In St. Luke, this temptation stands third. The real order is evidently that in the text; for otherwise our Lord's final answer, ver. 10, would not be in its place. It may be observed, that St. Luke makes no assertion as to succession, only introducing each temptation with καί: whereas τότε and παλιν here seem to mark succession. Dean Ellcott, for psychological reasons, which must be most untrustworthy when opposed to the express assertion of the sacred text (τότε ἀφίησιν αὐτόν), follows the order in St. Luke. For ἀν. πάλ. see ref. ἵστησιν—by the same power by which he brought Him.

πτερύγιον] Abundant instances have been produced to shew that πτερον was applied to a pointed roof or gable. Now the LXX use πτερεῖς and πτερύγιον as synonymous with πτερον; why may not the same be done in the N. T.? The general opinion, that our Lord was placed on Herod's royal portico, described in Jos. Antt. xv. 11. 5, is probably right: and the τό is in no way inconsistent with it. That portico overhung the ravine of Kedron from a dizzy height, ὥς, εἰ τις ἀπ' ἄκρου τοῦ ταύτης τόπου, ἀμφω συντιθεῖς τὰ βῆθη, διακτεῖναι, σκοροδιῶν, οὐκ ἔξικνουμένης τῆς ὄψεως εἰς ἀμύνητον τὸν βυθόν. The argument that it was probably on the other side, next the court, is grounded on the perfectly gratuitous assumption, that an exhibition to the people was intended. There is no authority for this in the text; the temptation being one not of ambition, but of presumption. The inference from

Eusebius, who, quoting Hegesippus, (Hist. ii. 23,) describes James the Just as set on and thrown from τὸ πτερύγιον τοῦ ναοῦ, among the people, is not decisive: for this term might embrace either side, as 'the cornice,' or 'the parapet' would.

6. γέγραπται] cited (nearly verbatim from the LXX, as almost all the texts in this narrative) as applying to all servants of God in general, and à fortiori to the Son of God: not as a prophecy of the Messiah.

7. πάλιν] not 'contra,' which it never simply means, not even in Gal. v. 3: 1 John ii. 8: but 'rursus' or 'iterum,' as the versions rightly render it. The addition of a second Scripture qualifies and interprets the first; but does not refute it.

8. ὄρος ὑψ. Μ.] The enquiry where and what this mountain was, is entirely nugatory, no data being furnished by the text. δείκνυσιν αὐτ. π. τ. β.]

The additional words in Luke, ἐν σιγγμῇ χρόνου, are valuable as pointing out to us clearly the supernatural character of this vision. If it be objected, that in that case there was no need for the ascent of the mountain,—I answer, that such natural accessories are made use of frequently in supernatural revelations: see especially Rev. xxi. 10. The attempts to restrict τοῦ κόσμου to Palestine, (which was, besides, God's peculiar portion and vineyard, as distinguished from the Gentile world,) or the Roman empire, are mere subterfuges: as is also the giving to δεικνυσιν the sense of 'points out the direction of.' The very passage of Polybius cited to support this view, completely refutes it, when taken entire. Hannibal, from the Alps, is appear to be sufficient ground for the distinction sometimes set up between the meanings of προσκυνεῖν with the dative and the same verb with the accusative. See, besides reff., Gen. xlix. 8: Exod. xi. 8. —From this time, our Lord is known by the devils, and cast them out by a word. Mark i. 24, 34; iii. 11; v. 7. 11.

disciples, Andrew and (probably) John, who followed Him, and were (on the next day? see note, John i. 44) joined by Simon Peter (35-43): then on the morrow Philip and Nathanael were called (44-52); three days after was the marriage in Cana (ii. 1-11); then our Lord went down to Capernaum and remained not many days (12); then followed the Passover; the cleansing of the temple (13-22); the belief of many on Jesus (23-25); the discourse with Nicodemus (iii. 1-21); the baptizing by Jesus (i. e. his disciples) (22-24); the question about purifying, and testimony of the Baptist (25-36); the journey through Samaria into Galilee, and discourse with the woman of Samaria (iv. 1-42); the return to Cana and healing of the ruler's son in Capernaum (43-54); and the journey to Jerusalem related in John v. 1. After that chapter St. John breaks off the first part of his narrative, and between his v. 47 and vi. 1, comes in the synoptic narrative, Matt. iv. 12-xiv. 15: Mark i. 14-vi. 30: Luke iv. 14-ix. 10. This omission is in remarkable consistency with St. Matthew's account of his own calling in ch. ix. 9. Being employed in his business in the neighbourhood of Capernaum, he now first becomes personally acquainted with the words and actions of our Lord. From what circumstances the former miracle in Capernaum had not attracted his attention, we cannot, of course, definitely say; we can, however, easily conceive. Our Lord was not then in Capernaum; for the ruler sent to Him, and the cure was wrought by word at a distance. If Matthew's attention had not been called to Jesus before, he might naturally omit such a narrative, which John gives probably from personal knowledge. The synoptic narratives generally omits this whole section of our Lord's travels and ministry. Its sources of information, until the last visit to Jerusalem, seem to have been exclusively Galilean, and derived from persons who became attached to Him at a later period than any of the events recorded in that first portion of John's Gospel. The objections to this view are, the narrative, in the three Gospels, of the baptism and temptation; but the former of these would be abundantly testified by John's disciples, many of whom became disciples of Jesus; and the latter could only have been derived from the mouth of our Lord Himself.

13. ἀναγέρ.] not 'returned,' but retired, withdrew; see ch. ii. 22, and note. No notice is given whence this withdrawal took place. The narrative is evidently taken up after an interval, and without any intention that it should follow closely on ver. 11. Wieseler, Chron. Synops. pp. 162 ff., sees in this a proof that St. Matthew recognized a ministry in Judaea during the interval. I cannot quite think this, but certainly he does not exclude it.

13. καταλιπὼν v. N.] Not on account of the behaviour of the Nazarenes to Him after the preaching in the Synagogue, Luke iv. 28, 29, as sometimes supposed; see notes, ib. ver. 81.

Καφαρναούμ.] This town, on the borders of the lake of Genesaret, was central in situation, and in the most populous and frequented part of Galilee. It besides was the residence of four at least of the Apostles, Andrew and Peter, and James and John—and probably of Matthew. The town was named from a fountain,—πρὸς γὰρ τῇ τῶν ἀνδρῶν ἐκράσις καὶ πηγὴ διαρθεῖν γονιμωτάτη. Καφαρναούμ αὐτῇ οἱ ἐπιχώριοι καλοῦσι [Joseph. B. J. iii. 10. 8].—ὡς τῇ ἐκ, viciis concolationis. It is from this time called 'His own city,' ch. ix. 1, see also ch. xvii. 24. 15.] This prophecy is spoken with direct reference to the days of the Messiah. It is here freely rendered from the Hebrew, without any regard to the LXX, which is wholly different. This, coming so immediately after a string of quotations literally from the LXX, seems to mark the beginning of a new portion of the Gospel, that of an eye-witness, begins where his

 that this preaching of repentance was of a different character from the after-teaching of our Lord; we recognize the same formula, though only partly cited, in ch.

 preaching repentance, Luke xiii. 3, after repeated declarations of His Messiahship.

complete the narrative. We have there furnished to us the reason why these two brethren were so ready to arise and follow One, whom, if we had this account only, we should infer they had never before seen. Add to this, that there is every probability that one of the other pair of brethren, John the son of Zebedee, is there described as having gone with Andrew to the dwelling of our Lord. It also tends to confirm the chronological view here taken, that Philip, the only one mentioned expressly by John as having been called by Jesus, is not mentioned here as called: and that Andrew, and the other disciple of John the Baptist, clearly were not called by Jesus in John i. 35—40, or the words παρ' αὐτῷ ἔμειναν ἤν ημίραν ἔκεινον, could not have been used: that these two continued disciples of the Baptist, is not probable; but that they were henceforth, but not invariably, attached to our Lord. I believe that the disciple whom Jesus loved was in His company during the whole of the events in John ii. iii. iv. and v., and on His return from Judea with His disciples, John having for a time returned to his business, as our Lord was now resident in Capernaum, received, as here related, this more solemn and final call. We must remember, that the disciples would naturally have gone up to Jerusalem at the Passover, John ii. 23, without a call from the Lord, and by what they saw there would become more firmly attached to him. The circumstance related in John xxi., that even after they were assured of the Resurrection, the Apostles returned to their occupation as fishermen, gives additional probability to the usual explanation of the call in our text. ^{20.} ἠφάνεντες ε.τ.λ.] i. e. from this time they were constant followers of the Lord. early origin to synagogues: and Deut. xxxi. 11, and Ps. lxxiv. 8, are cited as testimonies of it. But the former passage does not necessarily imply it: and it is doubtful whether that Psalm was not itself written after the captivity. They are generally supposed to have originated in Babylon, and thence to have been brought, at the return, into the mother land. See Neh. viii. 1—8. At the Christian era there were synagogues in every town, and in some larger towns several. See Acts ix. 2, 20. In Jerusalem, according to the Rabbinical writings, there were upwards of 450. (See Acts vi. 9, and note.) The people assembled in them on sabbath and festival days, and in later times also on the second and fifth days of each week, for public prayer and the hearing of portions of Scripture. τῶν ἱερῶν δι τῆς ὁ παρὼν ἢ τῶν γερόντων εἰς ἀναγινώσκει τοὺς ἱεροὺς νόμους αὐτοῖς καὶ καθ' ἑαυτὸν ἐξηγείται μέχρι σχεδὸν δέλης ὁφίας. Philo Fragm. vol. ii. p. 630. See Luke iv. 16: Acts xiii. 15. The officers of the synagogues were (1) the ἀρχισυναγωγός, Luke viii. 49; xiii. 14: Acts xviii. 8, 17, who had the care of public order, and the arrangement of the service; (2) the Elders, πρεσβύτεροι Luke vii. 3, ἀρχισυναγωγός Mark v. 22: Acts xiii. 15, who seem to have formed a sort of council under the presidency of the ἀρχισυναγωγός; (3) the legatus or angelus ecclesiae, who was the reader of prayers, and also secretary and messenger of the synagogues; (4) the ὑπηρέτης (Luke iv. 20), or chapel clerk, whose office was to prepare the books for reading, to sweep, open, and shut the synagogue. Besides these, there appear to have been alms-gatherers. The synagogue was fitted up with seats, of which the first row (πρωτακαθιδρία) were an object of ambition with the scribes (ch. xxiii. 6). A pulpit for the reader, lamps, and a chest for keeping the sacred books, appear to complete the furniture of the ancient synagogue. Punishments, e. g. scourging, were inflicted in the synagogues. (See ch. x. 17; xxiii. 34: Luke ix. 49: Acts xxii. 19; xxvi. 11.) The catechizing also of children seems to have taken place there (Lightfoot, xi. 281), as also disputations on religious questions.—Our Lord was allowed to read and teach in the synagogues, although of mean extraction according to the flesh, because of His miracles, and His supposed character as the professed leader and teacher of a religious sect. αὐτῶν] viz. of the Galileans: the subject being taken up out. of Γαλιλαία preceding. CHAPP. V. VI. VII.] THE SERMON ON THE MOUNT. In this form peculiar to Matthew.

1. 18-20 34] Without attempting a solution of the many difficulties which beset the question of time, place, and arrangement of our Lord's Sermon on the Mount, I shall state the principal views of these subjects, and make some remarks upon them. One of the weightiest questions is, as to the identity or otherwise of the Sermon with that given in Luke vi. 20-49. There is (I) the view that they are identical. This is generally taken by ordinary readers of Scripture, from their similarity in many points. It is also taken by most of the modern German Commentators, who uniformly reject every attempt at harmonizing by supposing the same or similar words to have been twice uttered. This view is, however, beset by difficulties. For (a) the sermon in Luke is expressly said to have been delivered after the selection of the Apostles: whereas that in the text is as expressly, by continual consecutive notes of time extending to the call of Matthew, (before which the Apostles cannot have been chosen,) placed before that event. And it is wholly unlikely that St. Matthew, assuming him to be the author of our Gospel, would have made a discourse, which he must have heard immediately after his call as an Apostle, take place before that call.—Then (β) this discourse was spoken on a mountain,—that, after descending from a mountain, in the plain. Possibly this may be got over, by rendering ἐν τόπῳ πεδινῷ "on a level place." See note on Luke, l. c.: and the citation from Stanley below. And again (γ), the two discourses are, though containing much common matter, widely different. Of 107 verses in Matt., Luke contains only thirty: his four beatitudes are balanced by as many woes: and in his text, parts of the sermon are introduced by sayings, which do not precede them in Matt. (e.g. Luke vi. 39 ff., 45 ff.), but which naturally connect with them.

(II) St. Luke epitomized this discourse, leaving out whatever was unsuitable for his Gentile readers, e.g. ch. v. 17-38. But this is improbable: for Luke in several verses is fuller than Matthew, and the whole discourse, as related by him, is connected and consecutive. (III) The two discourses are wholly distinct. This view is maintained by Greswell, vol. ii. Dis. xi., and principally from the arguments above noticed. But it also is not without grave difficulties, especially if we suppose, as Gres. does, that Luke had the Gospel of Matthew before him (but on this see Prolegg. ch. i. § ii.). That two discourses wholly distinct should contain so much in common, seems unlikely and unnatural.

It is hardly credible that two great public special occasions should be selected by the Lord near the commencement of His ministry, and two discourses delivered to the same audience, not identical, which might have been very probable, and impressive from that very circumstance,—nor consecutive, nor explanatory the one of the other, but only coinciding in fragments, and not even as two different reports at the distance of some years might be expected to do. Add to this, that those parts of the discourses in which Luke and Matthew agree, occur in both in almost the same order, and that the beginning and conclusion of both are the same.

(IV) St. Matthew gives a general compendium of the sayings of our Lord during this part of His ministry, of which St. Luke's discourse formed a portion, or perhaps was another shorter compendium. But the last stated objection applies with still greater force to this hypothesis, and renders it indeed quite untenable. Besides, it labours under the chronological difficulty in all its bearings. And to one who has observed throughout the close contextual connexion of the parts in this discourse, it will be quite incredible that they should be a mere collection of sayings, set down at hazard. See notes throughout. (V) The apparent discrepancies are sometimes reconciled by remembering, that there is no fixed time mentioned in any Evangelist for the special ordination of the Apostles, and that it is very doubtprædicari, adjunxit, spiritu, ut humilitatem intelligeres, non penuriam. Beati pauperes spiritu, qui propter Spiritum Sanctum voluntate sunt pauperes.' (Jerome in loc.) 'Pauperes spiritu, humiles et timentes Deum, id est, non habentes inflantem (or, inflatum) spiritum.' (Augustine in loc.) Again: 'Pauper Dei in animo est, non in sacco.' (Aug. Enarr. in Ps. cxxxi. 26.)—τῷ πν. is in opposition to τῷ σαρκί: so ἀπειριματοὶ τῇ καρδίᾳ, Acts vii. 51; ἀγία κ. τῷ σώματι κ. τῷ πνεύματι, 1 Cor. vii. 34.—These words cannot be joined with μακάριοι (as Olearius, Wetst., Michaelis, Paulus): see ver. 8.—The meaning of voluntary poverty, as that of the religious orders, given by many Romish interpreters, is out of the question. It seems however to have been adopted by many of the Fathers. Basil (on Ps. xxxiii. 5, vol. i. p. 147) says, ὅτι αἱ ἐκαινεῖ ἡ πτωχεία, ἀλλ' ἡ ἐκ προαίρεως κατὰ τὸν εὐαγγελικὸν σκοπὸν κατορθομένη πολλοὶ γὰρ πτωχοὶ μὲν τῇ περιουσίᾳ, πλεονεκτηῖνται οὗτοι δὲ τῇ προαίρεσι τυχάνουσιν. But the same father elsewhere explains the words, πτωχεὺς οὗ τοῦτ' ἐστὶν κατὰ χρῆματα ἐνδεὲς λέγει, ἀλλὰ τοῦτ' ἐστὶν κατὰ τὴν ἀληθείαν (vol. i. p. 597).—And Chrys. himself seems to waver: for next to the comment above cited, he says πνεῦμα γὰρ ἐνταῦθα τὴν ψυχὴν καὶ τὴν προαίρεσιν λέγει. He probably however means that the ψ. and προαίρ. are the departments of our being in which the πτωχεία takes place.—See Clem. Alex., 'Quis dives saluus,' § 17, p. 934, Pott.—As little can the bare literal sense of the words, which Julian scoffed at, be understood: viz. those who are ill-furnished in mind, and uneducated. See Rev. iii. 17. The idea (De Wette) is not improbable, that our Lord may have had a reference to the poor and subjugated Jewish people around him, once members of the theocracy, and now expectants of the Messiah's temporal kingdom; and, from their condition and hopes, taken occasion to preach to them the deeper spiritual truth. αὐτῶν ἔστ. ἡ β. τ. ἐκ.] See Luke iv. 17—21: James ii. 5. The βασιλεία must here be understood in its widest sense: as the combination of all rights of Christian citizenship in this world, and eternal blessedness in the next,

ch. vi. 33. But Tholuck well observes (Bergpredigt, p. 74 ff.), that all the senses of βασ. τ. θεοῦ (or οὐρ., or χριστοῦ) are only different sides of the same great idea—the subjection of all things to God in Christ. He cites from Origen (περι εὐχῆς, vol. i. p. 239): τῇ οὖν ἐν ἡμῖν βασιλείᾳ τοῦ θεοῦ ἡ ἀερότης ἀδιαλείπτως προκόπτουσιν ἐνοστήσεται, ὅταν πληρωθῇ τὸ παρὰ τῷ ἀποστόλῳ εἰρημένον, ὅτι ὁ χριστός, πάντων αὐτῷ τ. ἐχθρῶν ὑποταγόντων, παραδώσει τ. βασιλείαν τ. θεῷ κ. πατρί, ἵνα ὁ θεὸς τὰ πάντα ἐν πᾶσι.

4. μακ. οἱ πνθ.] The spiritual qualification in the former verse must be carried on to this, and the mourning understood to mean not only that on account of sin, but all such as happens to a man in the spiritual life. All such mourners are blessed: for the Father of mercies and God of all consolation being their covenant God, His comfort shall overbear all their mourning, and taste the sweeter for it. In Luke ii. 25, the Messiah's coming is called ἡ παράκλησις τοῦ Ἰσραὴλ.—This beatitude is by many editors (Lachmann, e. g.) placed after ver. 5. But the authority is by no means decisive, and I cannot see how the logical coherence of the sentences is improved by it.—In placing these two beatitudes first, the Lord follows the order in Isa. lxi. 1, which He proclaimed in the synagogue at Nazareth, Luke iv. 18.

5. οἱ πρᾶεῖς] A citation from Ps. xxxvii. 11. The usual dividers and alloters of the earth being mighty and proud conquerors, and the Messiah being expected as such a conqueror, this announcement, that the meek should inherit the earth, struck at the root of the temporal expectations of power and wealth in the Messiah's kingdom. This meekness is not mere outward lowliness of demeanour, but that true πραΰτης of Eph. iv. 2, whose active side (Stier) is ἀγάπη, and its passive side μακροθυμία. On the promise, compare Isa. lvii. 13—15; lx. 21: 1 Cor. iii. 22. That kingdom of God which begins in the hearts of the disciples of Christ, and is not ἐκ τοῦ κόσμου τοῦτου, shall work onwards till it shall become actually a kingdom over this earth, and its subjects shall inherit the earth: first in its millennial, and finally in its tum, Paulus Apostolus dicit. Ac per hoc self to the moral explanation, as also Euthymius.) They shall be satisfied—in remarkable parallel, Pa. xvi. 15 (LXX), ἐγὼ δὲ ἐν δικαιοσύνῃ δαψήσομαι τῇ set forth in the three first petitions of the Lord's prayer, 'Hallowed be Thy done on earth, as it is in heaven.

Euthymius, expanding Chrysostom. This beatitude comprises every degree of sympathy and mutual love and help; from that fulness of it which is shed abroad in those who have been forgiven much, and therefore love much,—down to those first beginnings of the new birth, even among those who know not the Lord, which are brought out in ch. xxv. 37—40, where see notes.

8. καθ. τῇ καρδίᾳ.] See Pa.
xxiv. 4, 6. It is not Levitical cleanness, nor mere moral purity, that is here meant:
but that inner purity, which (Acts xv. 9)
is brought about τῇ πίστει, has its fruit (1 Tim. i. 5) in love; which is, as in καθαρόν φῶς, καθαρά χαρά, &c., opposed to all διψυχία (James i. 8), and all hypocrisy and outward colouring; so that the καθ.
τ. κ. are οἱ ῥεραντισμένοι τὰς καρδίας ἀπὸ συνειδήσεως κωνηράς (Heb. x. 22). 'Hoc est mundum cor, quod est simplex cor: et quemadmodum lumen hoc videri non potest nisi oculis mundia, ita nec Deus vide-tur nisi mundum sit illud quo videri po-allusion to the nearer vision of God attained by progressive sanctification, of which St. Paul speaks, 2 Cor. iii. 18,— begun indeed in this life, but not perfected till the next, 1 Cor. xiii. 12. Read the magnificent conclusion of Augustine De Civit. Dei, xxii. 29, in which he enters more deeply into the meaning of this verse.

9. εἰρηνοποιοί.] More than 'the peaceful' ('pacifici,' Vulg.). It is doubtful whether the word ever has this meaning. Thus Euthymius, mostly after Chrysostom: οἱ μὴ μόνον αὐτοὶ μὴ στασιάζοντες, ἀλλὰ καὶ ἐτέρους στασιάζοντας συν-άγοντες εἰς εἰρήνην· υἱοὶ δὲ θεοῦ κληθῆαὐτοῦ· ὃ γέγονεν ἔργον συναγαγεῖν τὰ δισσώτα καὶ καταλλάξαι τὰ ἐκπεπολεμημένα. But even thus we do not seem to reach the full meaning, which probably is,

'they that work peace;' not confining the reference to the reconciliation of persons at variance: see note on James iii.

the highest sense, both generally, and by the Highest Himself, as such. Cf. Maldonatus: 'plus etiam quiddam mihi videtur vocari quam esse significare: nempe ita aliquid esse, ut appareat, ut omnium ore celebretur.' Let it ever be remembered, according to the order of these beatitudes, and the assertion of James iii. 17, that the wisdom from above is ^{πρωτον} ἀγνη, ^{δευτερα} εὐφραντική, implying no compromise with evil. And it is in the working out of this ^{ἀγνότης} that Luke xii. 51 is especially true.

10.] 'Martyres non facit poena, sed causa. Nam si poena martyres faceret, omnia metalla martyribus plena essent, omnes catenæ martyres traherent: omnes qui gladio feriuntur, coronarentur. Nemo ergo dicat, Quia pator, justus sum. Quia ipse qui primo passus est, pro iustitia passus est, ideo magnam exceptionem addidit. Beati qui persecutionem patiuntur propter iustitiam.' (Aug. Enarr. in Ps. xxxiv. 13.) See 1 Pet. iii. 14; iv. 14, which probably refers to this verse. The repetition of the promise in ver. 3 is a close of the string of promises as it began. See the remarkable variation in the var. readd.

11.] With the preceding verse the beatitudes end, in their general reference, and in this our Lord addresses ^{His disciples} particularly. The actions described in this verse are the expansion of ^{διδιωγμένοι} in the last. ^{διωξουσιν}, however, still means ^{persecute}; its ^{legal} usage is unknown in the N. T. ^{ψευδομενοι} does not belong to ^{ἕνεκα ἑμοῦ}, as some recent Commentators have supposed (Tholuck, Meyer), but to ^{εἰπωσιν}. The pres. part., as usual, carries with it the logical condition.

12. ^δ ^{μισθος} ὑμῶν.] A reward, not of debt, but of grace, as the parable in ch. xx. 1 ff. clearly represents it. 'An expression,' as De Wette observes, 'taken from our earthly commerce, and applied to spiritual things;' in which however we must remember, that the principal reference is to God as the giver, and not to us as the deservers: see the parable above cited, where the ^{μισθος} is not what was ^{earned}, but what was ^{covenanted}. 'Deus est debitor noster non ex commissio, sed ex promisso.' Aug. (Tholuck.) These words, ^{ἐν τοῖς οὐρανοῖς}, must not be taken as having any bearing on the question as to the ^{future habitation} of the glorified saints. Their use in this and similar expressions is not ^{local}, but ^{spiritual}, indicating the blessed state when ^{ἡ βασιλεία τῶν οὐρανῶν} shall have fully come. The local question is to be decided by wholly different testimonies of Scripture:—by the general tenor of prophecy, and the analogies of the divine dealings: and all of these seem to point rather to this earth, purified and renewed, than to the ^{heavens} in any ordinary sense of the term, as the eternal habitation of the blessed.

hoiada was stoned, 2 Chron. xxiv. 21; Isaiah, according to Jewish tradition, was sawn asunder by Manasseh.—The reasoning implied in γὰρ may be thus filled up:
 “and great will be their reward in heaven.”

13.] The transition from the preceding verses is easy and natural, from the διδωγμῖνοι ἔτιεν δικαιοσύνης, of which vv. 11, 12 were a sort of application, and the allusion to the ancient Prophets, τὸ ὑμῖς ἐστε τὸ ἅλ. τ. γ.—Elisha healed the unwholesome water by means of salt (2 Kings ii. 20), and the ordinary use of salt for culinary purposes is to prevent putrefaction: so (see Gen. xviii. 23—33) are the righteous, the people of God, in this corrupt world. It hardly seems necessary to find instances of the actual occurrence of salt losing its savour, for this is merely hypothetical. Yet it is perhaps worth noticing, that Maundrell, in his travels, found salt in the Valley of Salt, near Gehul, which had the appearance, but not the taste, having lost it by exposure to the elements (see the citation below);—and that Schöttgen maintains that a kind of bitumen from the Dead Sea was called ‘sal Sodomiticus,’ and was used to sprinkle the sacrifices in the temple;

 which salt was used, when its savour was gone, to strew the temple pavement, that the priests might not slip. This, however, is but poorly made out by him, (Schöttgen, Hor. Hebr. in loc.) Dr. Thomson, ‘The Land and the Book,’ p. 381, mentions a case which came under his own observation: where a merchant of Sidon had stored up a quantity of salt in cottages with earthen floors, in consequence of which the salt was spoiled, and Dr. T. saw “large quantities of it literally thrown into the street, to be trodden under foot of men and beasts.” He adds, “It is a well-known fact that the salt of this country, when in contact with the ground, or exposed to rain and sun, does become insipid and useless. From the manner in which it is gathered, much earth and other impurities are necessarily collected with it. Not a little of it is so impure that it cannot be used at all: and such salt soon effloresces and turns to dust—not to fruitful soil, however. It is not only good for nothing itself, but it actually destroys all fertility wherever it is thrown:

 and this is the reason why it is cast into the street.” τῆς γῆς, mankind and all creation: but a more inward reference, as to the working of the salt, than in τοῦ ἔσμου, ver. 14, where the light is something outwardly shewn.

μω-
 ρανθῇ = ἀναλον γίνηται, Mark ix. 50.
 ἀλισθῆσεται.] i. e. the salt; not impersonal, as Luther has rendered it,— womit wird man salzen? ‘wherewith shall salting be carried on?’ for τὸ ἅλς is the
 nom. to all three verbs, μωρανθῇ, ἀλισθ., and ἰσχύει. The sense is: ‘If you become untrue to your high calling, and spiritually effete and corrupted, there are no ordinary means by which you can be re-converted and brought back to your former state, inasmuch as you have no teachers and guides over you, but ought yourselves to be teachers and guides to others.’ But we must not from this suppose that our Lord denies all repentance to those who have thus fallen: the scope of His saying must be taken into account, which is not to crush the fallen, but to quicken the sense of duty, and cause His disciples to walk worthily of their calling. (See Heb.
 vi. 4—6, and note on Mark ix. 49, 50.)

The salt in the sacrifice is the type of God’s covenant of sanctification, whereby this earth shall be again hallowed for Him: His people are the instruments, in His hand, of this wholesome salting; all His servants in general, but the teachers and ministers of His covenant in particular.

So also Eph. v. 8: ἡγε σκότος, νῦν δὲ φῶς ἐν κυρίῳ—light, as partaking of His Light: for πᾶν τὸ φανερούμενον (see note, ib. ver. 13) φῶς ἴσθιν. οὐ θένεται . . .] Of course it is possible that our Lord may have had some town before Him thus situated, but not Bethulia, whose very existence is probably fabulous, being only mentioned in the apocryphal book of Judith. Recent travellers, as Drs. Stanley and Thomson (Sinai and Palestine, p. 429: the Land and the Book, p. 273), have thought that, notwithstanding the fact shewn by Robinson, that the actual city of Safed was not in existence at this time, some ancient portion of it, at all events its fortress, which is 'as aged in appearance as the most celebrated ruins in the country' (Thomson), may have been before the eye of our Lord as He spoke. It is 'placed high on a bold spur of the Galilean Anti-Lebanon,' and answers well to the description of a city 'lying on the mountain top.' 'The only other in view would be the village and fortress of Tabor, distinctly visible from the mount of Beatitudes, though not from the hills on the lake side. Either or both of these would suggest the illustration, which would be more striking from the fact, that this situation of cities on the tops of the hills is as rare in Galilee, as it is common in

Judaea.' Stanley, ubi supra. But the CHURCH OF GOD, the city on a hill (Isa. ii. 2: Gal. iv. 26: see also Heb. xii. 22), in allusion to their present situation, on a mountain, is most probably the leading thought. ¹⁵ μόδιον] A Latin word (the art. is by many supposed to express that the μόδιος is a vessel usually found in the house; but it is rather to be regarded as the sign of the generic singular, as in κοινοὶ τὸν ἄνθρωπον, ch. xv. 20)—called by the more general name σκεῦος, Luke viii. 16. καίουσιν, i. e. men in general: shewing, in the spiritual reference of the parable, that these lights of the world are 'lighted' by Him for whose use they are. See above. ¹⁶ οὕτως] i. e. like a candle on a candlestick—like a city on a hill; not οὕτως, ὅπως, 'so . . . that,' as our English version seems rather to imply. By rendering οὕτως in like manner, the ambiguity will be avoided. See ref., and note there. The sense of this verse is as if it were ὅπως, ἰδόντες ὑμῶν τ. κ. ἔργ. δοξάσωσιν τ. π. ὁ . . . the latter verb, and not the former, carrying the purpose of the action. Thus the praise and glory of a well-lighted and brilliant feast would be given, not to the lights, but to the master of the house; and of a stately city on a hill, not to the buildings, but to those who built them. The whole of this division of our Lord's sermon is addressed to all His followers, not exclusively to the ministers of his word. All servants of Christ are the salt of the earth, the light of the world (Phil. ii. 15). And all that is here said applies to us all. But à fortiori does it apply, in its highest sense, to those who are, among Christians, selected to teach and be examples; who are as it were the towers and pinnacles of the city, not only not hid, but letter in the alphabet: κεφαλαίαι are the little turns of the strokes by which one letter differs from another similar to it. Origen on Ps. xxxiii. (cited by Wetstein) says—τῶν στοιχείων παρ' Ἑβραίοις, λέγω δὲ τοῦ χὰφ καὶ τοῦ βήθ (z and s) πολλὰ ὁμοιότητα σωζόντων, ὥς κατὰ μηδὲν ἀλλήλων διαλλάττειν ἢ βραχίαις κεφαλαίαις. The Rabbinical writings have many sayings similar in sentiment to this, but spoken of the literal written law. (See Lightfoot, Hor. Heb. in loc.) It is important to observe in these days how the Lord here includes the O. T. and all its unfolding of the divine purposes regarding Himself, in His teaching of the citizens of the kingdom of heaven. I say this, because it is always in contempt and setting aside of the O. T. that rationalism has begun. First, its historical truth—then its theocratic dispensation and the types and prophecies connected with it, are swept away; so that Christ came to fulfil nothing, and becomes only a teacher or a martyr: and thus the way is paved for a similar rejection of the N. T.;—beginning with the narratives of the birth and infancy, as theocratic myths—advancing to the denial of His miracles—then attacking the truthfulness of His own sayings which are grounded on the O. T. as a revelation from God—and so finally leaving us nothing in the Scriptures but, as a German writer of this school has expressed it, ‘a mythology not so attractive as that of Greece.’ That this is the course which unbelief has run in Germany, should be a pregnant warning to the decriers of the O. T. among ourselves. It should be a maxim for every expositor and every student, that Scripture is a whole, and stands or falls together. That this is now beginning to be deeply felt in Germany, we have cheering testimonies in the later editions of their best Commentators, and in the valuable work of Stier on the discourses of our Lord. [Since however these words were first written, we have had lamentable proof in England, that their warnings were not unneeded. The course of unbelief which has issued in the publication of the volume entitled “Essays and Reviews,” has been in character and progress, exactly that above described: and owing to the injudicious treatment which has multiplied tenfold the circulation of that otherwise contemptible work, its fallacies are now in the hands and mouths of thousands, who, from the low standard of intelligent Scriptural knowledge among us, will never have the means of answering them. 1862.]

19.] There is little difficulty in this verse, if we consider it in connexion with the verse preceding, to which it is bound by the οὖν and the τούτων, and with the following, to which the γὰρ unites it. Bearing this in mind, we see (1) that λύσῃ, on account of what follows in ver. 20 and after, must be taken in the higher sense, as referring to the spirit and not the letter: whosoever shall break (have broken), in the sense presently to be laid down. (2) That τῶν ἐντ. τοῦτ. τῶν ἐλ. refers to ἱῶρα ἐν ἡ μία κεφαλαία above, and means one of these minute commands which seem as insignificant, in comparison with the greater, as the ἱῶρα and κεφαλαία in comparison with great portions of writing. (3) That ἐλάχιστος κληθ. does not mean ‘shall be excluded from,’ inasmuch as the question is not of keeping or not keeping the commandments of God in a legal sense, but of appreciating, and causing others to appreciate, the import and weight of even the most insignificant parts of God’s revelation of Himself to man; and rather therefore applies to teachers than to Christians in general, though to them also through the λύσῃ and ποιῇσθ. (4) That no deduction can be drawn from these words binding the Jewish law, or any part of it, as such, upon Christians. That this is so, is plainly shewn by what follows, where our Lord proceeds to pour upon the letter of the law the fuller light of the spirit of the Gospel: thus lifting and expanding (not destroying) every jot and tittle of that precursory dispensation into its full meaning in the life and practice of the Christian; who, by the indwelling of the divine Teacher, God’s Holy Spirit, is led into all truth and purity. (5) That these words of our Lord are decisive against such persons, whether ancient or modern, as would set aside the Old Testament as without significance, or inconsistent with the New. the Book of Common Prayer, Article vii.

ἐλάχιστος is in direct allusion to ελάχιστος; but it can hardly be said (De Wette, Tholuck) that, because there is no article, it means 'one of the least' (ein geringer), for the article is often omitted after an appellative verb. μέγας rests on different grounds; being positive, and in its nature generic.—See ch. xi. 11; xviii. 1—4.

On κληθήσεται, see note on ver. 9. Observe the conditional aorists, λύσῃ, ποιήσῃ, διδάξῃ, combined with the indic. fut. κληθήσεται,—and thus necessitating the keeping the times distinct. The time indicated by κληθήσεται is one when the λύσαι, ποιῆσαι, διδάξαι, shall be things of the past—belonging to a course of responsibility over and done with.

20.] An expansion of the idea contained in πληρώσαι, ver. 17, and of the difference between λύσῃ, which the Scribes and Pharisees did by enforcing the letter to the neglect of the spirit—and ποιήσῃ καὶ διδάξῃ, in which particulars Christians were to exceed the Pharisees, the punctilious observers, and the Scribes, the traditional expounders of the law.

δικαιοσύνη, purity of heart and life, as set forth by example in the ποιῶντες, and by precept in the διδάσκοντες. The whole of the rest of our Lord's sermon is a comment on, and illustration of, the assertion in this verse.

γραμματέων] Persons devoted to the work of reading and expounding the law (Heb. שֹׁרֵפִים), whose office seems first to have become frequent after the return from Babylon. They generally appear in the N. T. in connexion with the Pharisees: but it appears from Acts xxiii. 9, that there were Scribes attached to the other sects also. In Matt. xxi. 15, they appear with the chief priests; but it is in the temple, where (see also Luke xx. 1) they acted as a sort of police. In the description of the assembling of the great Sanhedrim (Matt. xxvi. 3; Mark xiv. 53; xv. 1) we find it composed of ἀρχιερεῖς, πρεσβύτεροι, and γραμματεῖς; and in Luke xxii. 66, of ἀρχιερεῖς καὶ γραμματεῖς. The Scribes uniformly opposed themselves to our Lord; watching Him to find matter of accusation, Luke vi. 7; xi. 53, 54; perverting His sayings, Matt. ix. 3, and His actions, Luke v. 30; xv. 2; seeking to entangle Him by questions, Matt. xxii. 35 (see note there); Luke x. 25; xx. 21; and to embarrass Him, Matt. xii. 38. Their authority as expounders of the law is recognized by our Lord Himself, Matt. xxiii. 1, 2; their adherence to the oral traditionary exposition proved, Matt. xv. 1 ff.; the respect in which they were held by the people shewn, Luke xx. 46; their existence indicated not only in Jerusalem but also in Galilee, Luke v. 17,—and in Rome, Josephus, Antt. xviii. 3. 5. They kept schools and auditories for teaching the youth, Luke ii. 46; Acta v. 34, compared with xxii. 3; are called by Josephus πατριῶν ἐξηγηταὶ νόμων, Antt. xvii. 6. 2; σοφισταί, B. J. i. 33. 2.

The construction πλεον τῶν γραμματέων καὶ τῶν Φαρισαίων elliptically for πλ. τῆς δικαιοσύνης τ. γρ. κ. τ. φ., is illustrated in Kühner (Gram. ii. § 749) under the name of 'comparatio compendiaris,' by Hom. Il. φ. 191, κρείσσων δ' αὐτῇ Διὸς γενεῇ ποταμοῖο τέτυκται; Pindar, Olymp. i. init., μηδ' ὀλυμπίας ἀγῶνα φέρετον ἀνδράσομεν, &c. Notice, that not only the hypocrites among the Scribes and Pharisees are here meant; but the declaration is, "Your righteousness must be of a higher order than any yet attained, or conceived, by Scribe or Pharisee." οὐ μὴ εἰσελθ.] A very usual formula (see ch. vii. 21; xviii. 3; xix. 17, 23, 24; John iii. 5 al.); implying exclusion from the blessings of the Christian state, and from the inheritance of eternal life.

21. ἡκούσατε] viz. by the reading of the law in the synagogues, and the expositions of the Scribes. τοῖς ἀρχαίοις] has been rendered, as in E. V., 'by the ancients'; in which case, Moses and his traditional expounders are classed together; or, 'to the ancients,'—which last interpretation seems to me to be certainly the right one. Both constructions are found (see ref.); but every instance of the former is either (as ch. vi. 1) resolvable into the latter, or, as Luke xxiii. 15, ambiguous, and none can be produced with ἡρήθη, whereas all the latter have this very word, which is never followed in the N. T. or LXX by any other substantive but that denoting the persons to whom the words are spoken. The omission of τοῖς ἀρχαίοις, vv. 27, 31, 38, 43, also favours the rendering to, which was the interpretation of the Greek fathers. Chrysostom expands it thus: τί οὖν αὐτός φησιν; ηκούσατε ὅτι ἡρήθη τοῖς ἀρχαίοις Ὁὐ φονεύσεις· καίτοι δ' καὶ ἡμεῖς αὐτὸς ἔσταιν ἀλλὰ τίως ἀπορώπως αὐτὰ τίθησιν. εἰτε γὰρ εἶπεν ὅτι ηκούσατε ὅτι εἶπον τοῖς ἀρχαίοις, δυσπαράδεικτος ὁ λόγος ἵγινετο, καὶ πᾶσιν ἂν προέστη τοῖς ἀκούουσιν· εἰτε αὖ πάλιν εἶπὼν ὅτι ηκούσατε ὅτι ἡρήθη τοῖς ἀρχαίοις παρὰ τοῦ πατρὸς μου, ἐπηγάγεν Ἐγὼ δὲ λίγω, μείζων ἂν ἴδοξεν εἶναι ὁ αὐθαδιασμός, Hom. xvi. p. 210. Meyer (ed. 2) has well observed that ἡρήθη τοῖς ἀρχαίοις corresponds to λίγω δὲ ὑμῖν, and the ηγώ to the understood subject of ἡρῶ. He has not, however, apprehended the deeper truth which underlies the omission of the subject of ἡρῶ, that it was the same person who said both. It will be noticed that our Lord does not here speak against the abuse of the law by tradition, but that every instance here given is either from the law itself, or such traditional teaching as was in accordance with it (e. g. the latter part of this verse is only a formal expansion of the former). The contrasts here are not between the law misunderstood and the law rightly understood, but between the law and its ancient exposition, which in their letter, and as given, were ενά,—and the same as spiritualized, πνευματικά, by Christ: not between two lawgivers, Moses and Christ, but between οἱ ἀρχαίοι and ὑμεῖς; between (the idea is Chrysostom's) the children by the same husband, of the bondwoman and of the freewoman. The above remarks comprise a brief answer to the important but somewhat misapprehended question, whether our Lord impugned the Mosaic law itself, or only its inadequate interpretation by the Jewish teachers? See this treated at great length by Tholuck, Bergp. pp. 153—165, edn. 3. There is no inconsistency in the above view with the assertion in ver. 19: the just and holy and true law was necessarily restricted in meaning and degraded in position, until He came, whose office it was to fulfil and glorify it. κριται] viz. the courts in every city, ordered Deut. xvi. 18, and explained by Josephus Antt. iv. 8. 14 to consist of seven men, and to have the power of life and death. λάσσω as implying a mutual, and καταλλάσσω, a merely one-sided reconciliation, has no foundation in fact. Our διαλλάγηθι is simply become reconciled—thyself, without being influenced by the status of the other towards thee. Remove the offence, and make friendly overtures to thy brother. πρῶτον belongs to ὑπαγε, not to διαλλάγηθι, (1) because ὑπ. πρῶτον is opposed to τότε ἐλθὼν, the departure to the return, not διαλλάγηθι to πρόσφερε; (2) by the analogy of the usage of such adverbs with imperatives. Compare ch. vii. 5 and the similar passage, Luke vi. 42: ch. vi. 33; xiii. 30: Mark vii. 27.

No conclusion whatever can be drawn from this verse as to the admissibility of the term altar as applied to the Lord's Table under the Christian system. The whole language is Jewish, and can only be understood of Jewish rites. The command, of course, applies in full force as to reconciliation before the Christian offering of praise and thanksgiving in the Holy Communion; but further nothing can be inferred.

26.] The whole of this verse is the earthly example of a spiritual duty which is understood, and runs parallel with it. The sense may be given: 'As in worldly affairs, it is prudent to make up a matter with an adversary before judgment is passed, which may deliver a man to a hard and rigorous imprisonment, so reconciliation with an offended brother in this life is absolutely necessary before his wrong cry against us to the Great Judge, and we be cast into eternal condemnation.'—The ἀντίδικος, in its abstract personification, is the offended law of God, which will cry against us in that day for all wrongs done to others; but in its concrete representation it is the offended brother, who is to us that law, as long as he has its claim upon us. The ὁδός, in the interpretation, is the way in which all men walk, the ὁδός πάσης τῆς γῆς of 3 Kings ii. 2, the ὁδός ἣ οὐκ ἵκαναστραφέσονται of Job xvi. 22. In the civil process, it represents the attempt at arbitration or private arrangement before coming into court: see Thol. p. 192, 3rd edit. So Chrys.: πρὸ μὲν γὰρ τῆς εἰσόδου σὲ κύριος εἰ τοῦ παντός· ἴδὼν δὲ ἐπιβῆς ἱεῖνων τῶν προθέρων, οὐδὲ σφόδρα σπονδαῖζον δυνήσῃ γὰρ καθ' ἑαυτὸν ὡς βούλει διαθίνας. Hom. xvi. p. 219.

26.] These words, as in the earthly example they imply future liberation, because an earthly debt can be paid in most cases, so in the spiritual counterpart they amount to a negation of it, because the debt can never be discharged. We have ἕως ἀποδῶ τὸ ἀμειλόμενον in ch. xviii. 30, where the payment was clearly impossible.

ὑπηρέτης = πράκτωρ in Luke xii. 58, and is the officer of the court who saw the sentences executed. If we are called on to assign a meaning to ὑπηρέτης in the interpretation, it must represent the chief of those who in ch.

27-30.] SECOND EXAMPLE. The law of adultery. 28. πᾶς ὁ βλέπων

The precise meaning should in this verse be kept in mind, as the neglect of it may lead into error. Our Lord is speaking of the sin of adultery, and therefore, however the saying may undoubtedly apply by implication to cases where this sin is out of the question—e. g. to the impure beholding of an unmarried woman with a view to fornication (it being borne in mind that spiritually, and before God, all fornication is adultery, inasmuch as the unmarried person is bound in loyalty and chastity to Him. See Stier below)—yet the direct assertion in this verse must be understood as applying to the cases where this sin is in question. And, again, the βλέπων πρὸς τὸ ἐπιθ. must not be interpreted of the casual evil thought which is checked by holy watchfulness, but the gazing with a view to feed that desire (for so πρὸς τὸ with an inf. must mean). And again, ἥδη ἰμ. abr. ἐν τ. κ. abr., whatever it may undoubtedly imply respecting the guilt incurred in God's sight, does not directly state any thing; but plainly understood, affirms that the man who can do this—viz. 'gaze with a view to feed unlawful desire'—has already in his heart passed the barrier of criminal intention; made up his mind, stifled his conscience; in thought, committed the deed. But perhaps there is justice in Stier's remark, Reden Jesu i. 129 (edn. 2), that our Lord speaks here after the O. T. usage, in which, both in the seventh commandment and elsewhere, adultery also includes fornication; for marriage is the becoming one flesh,—and therefore every such union, except that after the manner and in the state appointed by God, is a violation and contempt of that holy ordinance.

29.] An admonition, arising out of the truth announced in the last verse, to withstand the first springs and occasions of evil desire, even by the sacrifices of what is most useful and dear to us. ταῦτα προσέταξεν οὐ περὶ μελῶν διαλεγόμενος, ἀπαγε· οὐδαμοῦ γὰρ τῆς σαρκὸς τὰ ἐγελήματα εἶναι φησιν, ἀλλὰ πανταχοῦ τῆς γνώμης τῆς πονηρᾶς ἡ κατηγορία. οὐ γὰρ ὁ ὄψαλμός ἐστιν ὁ ὄρων, ἀλλ' ὁ νοῦς καὶ ὁ λογισμός. Chrys. Hom. xvii. p. 225: and to the same effect Euthymius, who adds ἀλλ' ὀφθαλμὸν μὲν δεξιὸν καλεῖ τὸν δικην ὀφθαλμοῦ στερεγόμενον δεξιὸν φίλον· χεῖρα δὲ δεξιὴν τὸν δικην χερσὶς χρησιμεύοντα δεξιὸν ὑπερήνην, καὶ εἰτε ἄνδρες εἴεν εἴτε γυναῖκες. λέγει τοίνυν ὅτι ἰδὼν οἱ τοιοῦτοι σκανδαλίζωσι σε πρὸς ἐμπάθειαν, μηδὲ τούτων φείσθ'· ἀλλ' ἔκκοψον αὐτοὺς τῆς πρὸς σε σχίσσεως, καὶ ρίψον πόρῳ σου. Philo Judæus reports that he had heard ἀπὸ θεσπεσίων ἀνδρῶν an interpretation of Deut. xxv. 12, singularly agreeing with this verse: εἰκότως οὖν τὴν . . . χεῖρα . . . ἀποκόπτειν διέρηται συμβολικῶς, οὐχ ὥπως ἀρρωτηριάζεται τὸ σῶμα στερεόμενον ἀναγκαιοτάτου μίρους,

31, 32.] THIRD EXAMPLE. The law of divorce. See note on ch. xix. 7—9. Lightfoot. Hor. Hebr., gives a form of the ἀποστάσιον, which was a divorcement a mensâ et thoro, and placed the woman absolutely in her own power, to marry whom she pleased. In Deut. xxiv. 1, the allowable reason of divorce is 'some uncleanness.' This the disciples of Shammai interpreted only of adultery; those of Hillel of any thing which amounted to uncleanness in the eyes of the husband. 32.] πορνείας must be taken to mean sin, not only before marriage, but after it also, in a wider sense, as including μοιχεία likewise. In the similar places, Mark x. 11; Luke xvi. 18, this exception does not occur; see however our ch. xix. 9. Chrysostom explains the connexion of this verse with the former to be, ἵνα γὰρ μὴ ἀκούσας Ἐξέλε τὸν ὀφθαλμόν, νομίσης καὶ περὶ γυναικὸς ταῦτα λίγισθαι, εὐκαιρῶς ἐπήγαγε τὴν ἐπιδιδόρωσιν ταύτην, ἐν τῷ ῥόπῳ μόνῳ συγχωρῶν ἐμβάλλειν αὐτῇν, ἐτίρω δὲ οὐδενί. Hom. xvii. p. 228. The figurative senses of πορνεία cannot be admissible here, as the law is one having reference to a definite point in actual life; and this its aim and end, restricts the meaning to that kind of πορνεία immediately applicable to the case. Otherwise this one strictly guarded exception would give indefinite and universal latitude.

ποιεῖ αὐτ. μοιχ.] 'Per alias nuptias, quarum potestatem dat divortium.' Bengel. καὶ ὃς ἐάν] How far the marriage of the innocent party after separation (on account of πορνεία) is forbidden by this or the similar passage ch. xix. 9, is a weighty and difficult question. By the Roman Church such marriage is strictly forbidden, and the authority of Augustine much cited, who strongly upholds this view, but not without misgivings later in life. 'Scripsi duos libros de conjugii adulterinis, . . . cupiens solvere difficultatim questionem. Quod utrum enodatissime fecerim nescio; immo vero non me pervenisse ad hujus rei perfectionem sentio.' Retract. ii. 57. On the other hand, the Protestant and Greek Churches allow such marriage. Certainly it would appear, from the literal meaning of our Lord's words (if ἀπολελ. be taken as perfectly general), that it should not be allowed: for if by such divorce the marriage be altogether dissolved, how can the woman be said μοιχεῖσθαι by a second marriage? or how will St. Paul's precept (1 Cor. vii. 11) find place, in which he says, ἐὰν δὲ καὶ χωρισθῇ, μὴτις ἀγαπῶς ἢ τῷ ἀνδρὶ καταλλαγήτω? for stating this as St. Paul does, prefaced by the words οὐκ ἵγώ, ἀλλ' ὁ κύριος, it must be understood, and has been taken, as referring to this very verse, or rather (see note in loc.) to ch. xix. 6 ff., and consequently can only suppose πορνεία as the cause. Besides which, the tenor of our Lord's teaching in other places (see above) seems to set before us the state of marriage as absolutely indissoluble as such, however he may sanction the expulsion a mensâ et thoro of an unfaithful wife. Those who defend the other view suppose the ἀπολελυμένην to mean, when unlawfully divorced, not for πορνεία; and certainly this is not improbable. We may well leave a matter in doubt, of which Augustine could write thus: 'In ipsis divinis sententiis ita obscurum est utrum et iste, cui quidem sine dubio adulteram licet dimittere, adulter tamen habeatur si alteram duxerit, ut, quantum existimo, venialiter ibi quisque fallatur.' De Fide atq.

 Op. c. 19. Meyer gives as a reason for believing ἀπολελ. to refer only to the unlawfully divorced: "ἀπολελ. is not qualified (cf. παρενδὸς λόγου πορνείας), because the punishment of death was attached to adultery (Levit. xx. 10; Michael Mos. Recht. § 260 ff.), and consequently under the law the marrying a woman divorced for adultery could never happen." Stier says in a note to his 2nd edn.: "we hold it clear that ἀπολ. can only refer to the woman unlawfully divorced, and then there is no prohibition of the second marriage of one divorced on account of adultery; we see here nothing at all 'obscu-rum,' as Augustine in the passage cited by Alford." [I may remark, that ἀπολελυμένην is most naturally rendered, "her, when divorced:" not "a divorced woman," as Words. It is a secondary predicate, of which the subject is to be supplied out of ἀσθήν above. Still less of course is it to be rendered "the divorced woman," τὴν ἀπολελυμένην. And thus understood, the saying concerning marriage after divorce applies only, as far as this passage is concerned, to unlawful divorce, not to that after πορνεία.]

33-37.] FOURTH EXAMPLE. The law of oaths. 33, 34.] The exact meaning of these verses is to be ascertained by two considerations. (1) That the Jews held all those oaths not to be binding, in which the sacred name of God did not directly occur: as Philo states (De Special.

 Legg. p. 770, Potter), προσλαβέντω τις, εἰ βούλοιστο, μὴ μὴν τὸ ἀνωτάτω καὶ πρσιβύτατον εὐθεὲς αἰτίον, ἀλλὰ γῆν, ἥλιον, ἀστέρας, οὐρανόν, τὸν σὺμπαντα κόσμον.
 and Lightfoot (Hor. Hebr. ad locum) cites from the rabbinical books, 'Si quis jurat per calum, per terram, per solem,

etc. . . non est juramentum.' See note, ch. xxiii. 16. It therefore appears that a stress is to be laid on this technical distinction in the quotation made by our Lord; and we must understand as belonging to the quotation, 'but whatever thou shalt swear not to the Lord may be transgressed.' (2) Then our Lord passes so far beyond this rule, that He lays down (including in it the understanding that all oaths must be kept if made, for that they are all ultimately referable to swearing by God) the rule of the Christian community, which is not to swear at all; for that every such means of strengthening a man's simple affirmation arises out of the evil in human nature, is rendered requisite by the distrust that sin has induced, and is, therefore, out of the question among the just and true and pure of heart. See James v. 12, and note there, as explanatory why, in both cases, swearing by the name of God is not specified as forbidden.
 In the words, 'Swear not at all,' our Lord does not so much make a positive enactment by which all swearing is to individuals forbidden, e. g. on solemn occasions, and for the satisfaction of others, (for that would be a mere technical Pharisaism wholly at variance with the spirit of the Gospel, and inconsistent with the example of God himself, Heb. vi. 13-17; vii. 21;
 of the Lord when on earth, whose ἀμήν ἀμήν λέγω ὑμῖν was a solemn assevera-tion, and who at once respected the solemn adjuration of Caiaphas, ch. xxvi. 63, 64;
 of His Apostles, writing under the guidance of His Spirit, see Gal. i. 20: 2 Cor.
 i. 23: Rom. i. 9: Phil. i. 8, and especially 1 Cor. xv. 31; of His holy angels, Rev. x.
 6,) as declare to us, that the proper state of Christians is, to require no oaths; that when τὸ πονηρόν is expelled from among them, every vai and oē will be as decisive as an oath, every promise as binding as a vow. We observe (α) that these verses imply the unfitness of vows of every kind as rules of Christian action; (β) that the greatest regard ought to be had to the scruples of those, not only sects, but individuals, who object to taking an oath, and every facility given in a Christian state for their ultimate entire abolition.

34.] Compare ch. xxiii. 16—22. Dean Trench observes (Serm. on Mount, p. 55),
 'men had learned to think that, if only God's name were avoided, there was no irreverence in the frequent oaths by heaven, by the earth, by Jerusalem, by their own heads, and these brought in on the slightest need, or on no need at all; just as now-a-days the same lingering half-respect for the Holy Name will often cause men, who would not be wholly profane, to substitute for that name sounds that nearly resemble, but are not exactly it, or the name, it may be, of some heathen deity.' Observe that the predicates, θρόνος, υποπόδιον, πόλις, being placed for emphasis before the copula, are without articles: it would be ὅτι ἐστὶν ὁ θρόνος, &c.

34.] For the allusions see ref.
 Isa. and Psa. ὁμν. ἐν is a Hebraism:
 the classical usage is with κατὰ and a gen.,

36. οὐ δύνασαι μίαν τρ. λ. τ. ἡ μ.] Thou hast no control over the appearance of grey hairs on thy head—thy head is not thine own;—thou swearest then by a creature of God, whose destinies and changes are in God's hand; so that every oath is an appeal to God. And, indeed, men generally regard it as such now, even unconsciously.

37. val val οὐ οὐ] The similar place, ref. James, admirably illustrates this—ἦτω ὑμῶν τὸ ναι ναι καὶ τὸ οὐ οὐ—let these words only be used,
 and they in simplicity and unreservedness.

ἐκ τοῦ πονηροῦ] See ref. The gender is ambiguous, as it may constructionally be in the Lord's prayer, ch. vi. 13, but see note there. It is quite immaterial to the sense, in which gender we understand it; for the evil of man's corrupt nature is in Scripture spoken of as the work of ὁ πονηρός, and is itself τὸ πονηρόν. See John viii. 44: 1 John iii. 8.

38—41.] FIFTH EXAMPLE. The law of retaliation.

38.] That is, such was the public enactment of the Mosaic law, and, as such, it implied a private spirit of retaliation which should seek such redress; for the example evidently refers to private as well as public retribution. Here again our Lord appears to speak of the true status and perfection of a Christian community,—not to forbid, in those mixed and but half-Christian states, which have ever divided so-called Christendom among them, the infliction of judicial penalties for crime. In fact Scripture speaks, Rom. xiii. 4, of the minister of such infliction as the minister of God. But as before, our Lord shows us the condition to which a Christian community should tend, and to further which every private Christian's own endeavours should be directed. It is quite beside the purpose for the world to say, that these precepts of our Lord are too highly pitched for humanity, and so to find an excuse for violating them. If we were disciples of His in the true sense, these precepts would, in their spirit, as indicative of frames of mind, be strictly observed; and,
 as far as we are His disciples, we shall attain to such their observance.

Here again, our Lord does not contradict
 the Mosaic law, but expands and fulfils it, declaring to us that the necessity for it would be altogether removed in the complete state of that kingdom which He came to establish.

Against the notion that ὁφθ. ἀντὶ ὁφθ. κ.τ.λ. sanctioned all kinds of private revenge, Augustine remarks, 'Quandoquidem et illud antiquum ad reprimendas flammās odiorum, sœvientiumque immoderatos animos refrœnandos, ita præceptum est. Quis enim tantundem facile contentus est reponere vindictæ quantum accepit injuriæ? Nonne videmus homines leviter læsos moliri eadem, sitire sanguinem, vixque invenire in malis inimici unde satientur? Huic igitur immoderatæ et per hoc injustæ ultioni lex justum modum figens, pœnam talionis instituit: hoc est ut qualem quisque intulit injuriam, tale supplicium pendat. Proinde, "Oculus pro oculo, dentem pro dente," non fomes sed limes furoris est; non ut id quod sopitum erat inde accenderetur, sed ne id quod ardebat ultra extenderetur impositus.' Cont. Faust. xix. 25. See 1 Cor. vi. 1—6. The accusatives ὁθαλμόν, ὀδόντα are perhaps in ref. Exod. governed by δώσει, which immediately precedes them. But it may be noticed, that in ref. Levit., where the construction would require nominatives, we have the saying, as a proverb, in the accusative form. In ref. Deut., the case is exactly as here.

39. μὴ ἀντιστῆναι.] Here again, we have our divine Lawgiver legislating, not in the bondage of the letter so as to stultify His disciples, and in many circumstances to turn the salt of the earth into a means of corrupting it,—but in the freedom of the spirit, laying down those great principles which ought to regulate the inner purposes and consequent actions of His followers. Taken slavishly and literally, neither did our Lord Himself conform to this precept (John xviii. 22, 23), nor his Apostles (Acts xxiii. 3). But truly, and in the spirit, our blessed Redeemer obeyed it; 'He gave his back to the smiters, and his cheeks to them that plucked off the hair, and hid not his face from shame and spitting' (Isa. l. 6): and his Apostles also, see 1 Cor. iv. 9—13.

τῷ ὀννηρῷ] the evil man; 'him who injures thee.' Or, perhaps, in the indefinite sense, as before, evil, generally, 'when thus directed against thee.' Only, the other possible meaning there, 'the evil one,' is precluded here. ἀντιστηγε τῷ διαβόλῳ: but not this particular form of his working (viz. malice directed against thyself) so as to revenge it on another. 40, 41.] See note on ver.

39. κριθῆναι imports legal contention only, and is thus distinguished from the violence in ver. 39. (Meyer, against Tholuck [but not in edn. 3] and De Wette.) λαβεῖν, i. e. in pledge for a debt: see Exod. xxii. 26. χιτῶνα, the inner and less costly garment; ἱμάτιον, the outer and more valuable, used also by the poor as a coverlet by night (Exod. ubi supra). In Luke vi. 29 the order is inverted, and appears to be that in which the two garments would be taken from the body, that verse referring to abstraction by violence. See the apostolic comment on this precept, 1 Cor. vi. 7.

as a burden;—and in the same manner

The proper understanding of the command in this verse may be arrived at from considering the way in which the Lord Himself, who declares, 'If ye shall ask any thing in my name, I will do it' (John xiv. 14), performs this promise to us. It would obviously be, not a promise of love,
but a sentence of condemnation to us, understood in its bare literal sense; but our gracious Saviour, knowing what is good for us, so answers our prayers, that we never are sent empty away; not always, indeed, receiving what we ask,—but that which in the very disappointment we are constrained thankfully to confess is better than our wish. So, in his humble sphere, should the Christian giver act.
To give every thing to every one—the sword to the madman, the alms to the imposter, the criminal request to the temptress—would be to act as the enemy of others and ourselves. Ours should be a higher and deeper charity, flowing from those inner springs of love, which are the sources of outward actions sometimes widely divergent; whence may arise both the timely concession, and the timely refusal. As Chrysostom observes on a former verse, μὴ τοῖνον ἀπλῶς τὰ πράγματα ἐξετάσωμεν, ἀλλὰ καὶ καιρὸν καὶ αἰτίαν καὶ γνώμην καὶ προσώπων διαφορὰν, καὶ

^{43—48.]} SIXTH EXAMPLE. ^{43.]} The law of love and hatred. ^{43.]} The Jews called all Gentiles indiscriminately 'enemies.' In the Pharisaic interpretation therefore of the maxim (the latter part of which, although a gloss of the Rabbis, is a true representation of the spirit of the law, which was enacted for the Jews as a theocratic people), it would include the 'odium humani generis' with which the Jews were so often charged. But our Lord's 'fulfilment' of neighbourly love extends it to all mankind—not only foreign nations, but even those who are actively employed in cursing, reviling, and persecuting us; and the hating of enemies is,
in His fulfilment of it, no longer an individual or national aversion, but a coming out and being separate from all that rebel

But the aor. somewhat modifies it, being literally "that ye may have become," i. e. "may be." See similar instances in ch. xviii. 3; xx. 26. υἱὸς τοῦ π.] i. e. in being like Him. Of course there is allusion to our state of vici by covenant and adoption; but the likeness is the point especially here brought out. So μιμηταὶ τοῦ θεοῦ, Eph. v. 1. The more we lift ourselves above the world's view of the duty and expediency of revenge and exclusive dealing, into the mind with which the 'righteous Judge, strong and patient, who is provoked every day,' yet does good to the unthankful and evil,—the more firmly shall we assure, and the more nobly illustrate, our place as sons in His family, as ἐκκληθέντες εἰς τὴν βασιλείαν τῶν οὐρανῶν. Chrysostom beautifully observes, καίτοιγε οὐδαμῶς τὸ γενόμενον ἴσον, οὐ μόνον διὰ τὴν τῆς εὐεργιστίας ὑπερβολήν, ἀλλὰ καὶ διὰ τὴν τῆς ἀξίας ὑπεροχήν. σὺ μὲν γὰρ παρὰ τοῦ ὁμοδούλου καταφρονεῖς, ἡμεῖς δὲ παρὰ τοῦ δούλου καὶ μυρία εὐεργετηθέντος· καὶ σὺ μὲν ῥήματα χαριζῇς ἐυχόμενος ὑπὲρ αὐτοῦ, αὐτὸς δὲ πράγματα πολλὰ μέγαρα καὶ θανάσιμα, τὸν ἥλιον ἀνάπτων καὶ τοὺς ἰησιούς ὁμβροὺς διδούς. ἀλλ' ὅμως καὶ οὕτω διδωμι ἴσον εἶναι, ὥς ἀνθρώπον ἐγχεῖν εἶναι. μή τοίνυν μίσει τὸν ποιῶντα ἐκ-κῶς, τοιοῦτον ὄντα σοὶ πρόξενον ἀγαθῶν, καὶ εἰς τοσαύτην ἀγοντὰ σε τιμὴν· μή καταρῶ τῷ ἐκπνέοντι· ἵπαι τὸν μὲν πόνον ἐπίστης, τοῦ δὲ καρποῦ ἀπιστερή-θης· καὶ τὴν μὲν ζημίαν ὁσέως, τὸν δὲ

He remarks, "Manifesta est ratio cur Dominus iusserit ἀγαπᾶν τοὺς ἐχθρούς, non autem φιλεῖν. Nam φιλεῖν, amare, pessimum quemque vir honestus non potest: sed poterit eum tamen ἀγαπᾶν, i. e. bene ei cupere et facere, quippe homo homini, cui etiam Deus beneficiat. Amor imperari non potest, sed dilectio: dilectio humanitatis est, amor eorum tantum, quibus eadem mens est, idem animus." See further in notes on John xi. 5. τελῶναι] This race of men, so frequently mentioned as the objects of hatred and contempt among the Jews, and coupled with sinners, were not properly the publicans, who were wealthy Romans, of the rank of knights, farming the revenues of the provinces; but their underlings, heathens or renegade Jews, who usually exacted with recklessness and cruelty. "The Talmud classes them with thieves and assassins, and regards their repentance as impossible." Wordsw. In interpreting these verses we must carefully give the persons spoken of their correlative value and meaning: ye, Christians, sons of God, the true theocracy, the βασιλ. τ. οὐρ.—these τελῶναι or ἐθνικοί, men of this world, actuated by worldly motives.—‘what thank have ye in being like them?’ 47. δαπάνησθε]

Here, most probably in its literal sense. Jews did not salute Gentiles: Mohammedans do not salute Christians even now in the East.

48. ἔσεσθε] Not altogether imperative in meaning, but including the imperative sense: such shall be the state, the aim of Christians.

τέλειοι] complete, in your love of others; not one-sided, or exclusive, as these just mentioned, but all-embracing, and God-like, = οἰκτιρμοῖς, Luke vi. 36. ἐμεῖς is emphatic.

No countenance is given by this verse to the ancient Pelagian or the modern heresy of perfectibility in this life. Such a sense of the words would be utterly at variance with the whole of the discourse. See especially vv. 22, 29, 32, in which the imperfections and conflicts of the Christian are fully recognized. Nor, if we consider this verse as a solemn conclusion of the second part of the Sermon, does it any the more admit of this view, asserting as it does that likeness to God in inward purity, love, and holiness, must be the continual aim and end of the Christian in all the departments of his moral life. But how far from having attained this likeness we are, St. Paul shews us (Phil. iii. 12); and every Christian feels, just in the proportion in which he has striven after it. Augustine argues for the true sense of this and similar passages of Scripture against the Pelagians at length, De peccatorum meritis et remissione, lib. ii. ch. 12—17, and De perfectione justitiæ hominis, ch. 8, 9.—οἱ μὲν ἀγαπῶντες τοὺς ἀγαπῶντας αὐτοὺς ἀρεταίς εἰσιν εἰς ἀγάπην, οἱ δὲ τοὺς ἐχθρούς, τίλειοι. Euthym. On the sense see 1 Pet. i. 15. Thol. quotes from Plato, Theæt. p. 176, διὸ καὶ περᾶσθαι χρὴ ἐνθὺνδὲ ἐκείναι φεύγειν ὅτι τάχιστα φωνὴ δὲ ὁμοίωσις θεῷ κατὰ τὸ δυνατόν ὁμοίωσις δὲ δίκαιον καὶ δαιον μετὰ φρονήσεως γένεσθαι.

CHAP. VI. 1—18.] The THIRD DIVISION OF THE SERMON, in which the disciples of Christ are warned against hypocritical display of their good deeds, by the examples of abuses of the duties of almsgiving (ver. 2), praying (ver. 5), and fasting (ver. 16).

1.] The discourse of our Lord now passes from actions to motives; not that He has not spoken to the heart before, but then it was only by inference, now directly.

δικαιοσύνη] not ‘benevolence,’ or ‘alms,’ as ἡγῆς in rabbinical usage,—for this meaning is never found in the N. T., and in the apocryphal reff. a distinction is made, though the two are coupled closely together. Besides, here we have λημοσύνη treated of as a distinct head below. It is best then to render δίκ., righteousness, as in ch. v. 20, as a general term including the three duties afterwards treated of. The words πρὸς τὸ θεαθ. clearly define the course of action objected to:—not the open benevolence of the Christian who lets his light shine that men may glorify God, but the ostentation of him whose object is the praise and glory coming from man. ἵστι γὰρ καὶ ἐμπροσθεν τῶν ἀνθρώπων ποιοῦντα, μὴ πρὸς τὸ θεαθῆναι ποιῖν καὶ μὴ ποιοῦντα ἐμπροσθεν πάντων, πρὸς τὸ θεαθῆναι ποιῖν, Chrysostom, Hom. xix. p. 245. εἰ δὲ μήγε] does not apply to προεῖχετε, so as to mean, 'if ye do not take heed;' but to μὴ ποιεῖν, and means, if ye do. That this is so, is clear from the reff. On the force of the γε, modifying the condition expressed in the εἰ, and concentrating it on the example given, see Klotz ad Devar., p. 527, and ante, p. 306.

2-4.] FIRST EXAMPLE. Almsgiving.

2. μὴ σαλπίσκῃς] A proverbial expression, not implying any such custom of the hypocrites of that day, but the habit of self-laudation, and display of good works in general. οὐχ ὅτι σάλπιγγας εἶχον ἱεῖνοι, ἀλλὰ τὴν πολλὴν αὐτῶν ἐπιδείκναι βούλεται μανίαν τῇ λίξει τῆς μεταφορᾶς ταύτης, κωμωδῶν ταύτην καὶ ἱεροποιεῖν αὐτοῦς. Chrys. Hom. xix. p. 245. Meyer remarks that the word σαλπίσκῃς is tuba canas, not tuba canis cures, and must therefore refer to what the person himself does: but all verbs of action may surely refer to action per alterum, so that this does not decide the point. Many Commentators, among whom are Calvin and Bengel, think that the words are to be taken literally; and Euthym. mentions this view: φασὶ δὲ τινες ὅτι ὑποκριταὶ τότε διὰ σάλπιγγος συνεκάλουν τοὺς δεομένους. But Light-foot says, "non inveni, quæverim licet multum serioque, vel minimum tubæ vestigium in præstandis elemosynis." See his note, containing an account of the practices of the Jews in giving alms;—and many illustrative passages in Tholuck; among which may be mentioned Cic. ad diversos xvi. 21, 'te buccinatorem fore existimationis meæ.' [ἐμπρ. σου] according to the way in which the former verse is taken, these words are variously understood to apply to the trumpet being held up before the mouth in blowing (as Meyer), or to another person going before (Thol., al.). συναγωγαῖς can hardly bear any sense but synagogues, see ver. 5: and if so, the literal meaning of σαλπίσκῃς cannot well be maintained. The synagogues, as afterwards the Christian churches, were the regular places for the collection of alms: see Tholuck and Vitranga de Synag. vet. iii. l. 13.

ἀπτεχουσιν] have in full,—exhaust: not have their due reward: see reff. Plutarch in Solon (Wetst.) says, that he who marries for pleasure, and not for children, τὸν μισθὸν ἀπείχει. 3.] σὺ, emphatic: see ch. v. 48. μὴ γινώτω] Another popular saying, not to be pressed so as to require a literal interpretation of it in the act of almsgiving, as De Wette and others have done, but implying simplicity, both of intention and act. Equally out of place are all attempts to explain the right and left hand symbolically, as was once the practice. The sound sense of Chrysostom preserves the right interpretation, where even Augustine strays into symbolism:

7. βατταλογησεται] a word probably without any further derivation than an imitation of the sounds uttered by stammerers, who repeat their words often without meaning; (κατὰ μίμησιν τῆς φωνῆς, Hesych.)—Suidas, Eustath., and others, suppose it derived from a certain stammering Battus, Herod. iv. 155. But the name of this Battus seems to have been given from the circumstance; καὶ τὸ ἰσχυρόφωνος καὶ τραυλός, τῷ ὀνόματι ἐτίθηεν Βάττας. We have βατταρίζω and its derivatives with the same signification; and Aeschines called Demosthenes βάταλος (περί σρ. p. 288. 17 Bekker). Hence the sense has generally been held to be, 'do not make unmeaning repetitions.' But most of the fathers (see the passages in Thol., and in Suicer sub voce) understand by βαττ., the praying περί τὰ ἀνωφελῆ τε καὶ μάταια (so Greg. Nyss.), or λίγειν τὰ διυφθαρμύνα ἔργα, ἢ λόγους, ἢ νοήματα ταπεινά τυγχάνοντα (Orig.), or ὅταν τὰ μὴ προσήκοντα αἰτῶμεν κατὰ τῷ θεῷ δυνάστεως κ. δόξας: &c. Taking the word in its largest meaning, that of saying things irrelevant and senseless, it may well include all these.

εθνικοί] 'prece qua fatigant virgines sanctae minus audientem carmina Vestam?' Hor. Od. i. 2. 26. 'Nisi illos (Deos) tuo ex ingenio judicas, Ut nil credas intelligere nisi idem dictum est centies.' Ter. Heaut. v. 1. What is forbidden in this verse is not much praying, for our Lord Himself passed whole nights in prayer: not praying in the same words, for this He did in the very intensity of His agony at Gethsemane; but the making number and length a point of observance, and imagining that prayer will be heard, not because it is the genuine expression of the desire of faith, but because it is of such a length, has been such a number of times repeated. The repetitions of Paternosters and Ave Marias in the Romish Church, as practised by them, are in direct violation of this precept; the number of repetitions being prescribed, and the efficacy of the performance made to depend on it. But the repetition of the Lord's Prayer in the Liturgy of the Church of England is not a violation of it, nor that of the Kyrie Eleison, because it is not the number of these which is the object, but each has its appropriate place and reason in that which is pre-eminently a reasonable service. Our Lord was also denouncing a Jewish error. Light-foot quotes from the Rabbinical writings, 'Omnis qui multiplicat orationem, auditur.' Hor. Hebr. in loc. Augustine puts admirably the distinction between much praying and much speaking: 'Absit ab oratione multa locutio; sed non desit multa precatio, si fervens perseverat intentio. Nam multum loqui, est in orando rem necessariam superfluis agere verbis; multum autem precari, est ad eum quem precamur diuturna et pia cordis excitatione pulsare. Nam plerumque hoc negotium plus gemitibus quam sermonibus agitur; plus fletu, quam assatu.' Ep. cxxx. 10. And Chrysostom, in one of his finest strains of eloquence, comments on this verse: μὴ τοίνυν τῷ σχήματι τοῦ σώματος, μηδὲ τῇ κραυγῇ τῆς φωνῆς, ἀλλὰ τῇ προθυμίᾳ τῆς γνώμης τὰς εὐχὰς ποιούμεθα· μηδὲ μετὰ φόρου καὶ ἡχῆς καὶ πρὸς ἐπιδείξειν, ὥς καὶ τοὺς πλησίον ἐκπρόειν, ἀλλὰ μετὰ ἰπικτικῆς πόσης καὶ τῆς κατὰ διάνοιαν συντροβῆς καὶ δακρύων τῶν ἐνδοθεν. Hom. xix. p. 248. Those who have the opportunity should by all means read the whole passage, which is too long for insertion in a note.

THE LORD'S PRAYER.

9.] There is very slender proof of what is often asserted, that our Lord took nearly the whole of this prayer from existing Jewish formulae. Not that such a view of the matter would contain in it any thing irreverent or objectionable; for if pious Jews had framed such petitions, our Lord, who came πλεῖν every thing that was good under the Old Covenant, might in a higher sense and spiritual meaning, have recommended the same forms to His disciples. But such does not appear to have been the fact. Lightfoot produces only the most general common-place parallels for the petitions, from the Rabbinical books.

With regard to the prayer itself we may remark, 1. The whole passage, vv. 7—15, is digressive from the subject of the first part of this chapter, which is the discouragement of the performance of religious duties to be seen of men, and is resumed at ver. 16. Neander (Leben Jesu, p. 349, note) therefore supposes that this passage has found its way in here as a sort of accompaniment to the preceding verses, but is in reality the answer of our Lord to the request in Luke xi. 1, more fully detailed than by that Evangelist. But to this I cannot assent, believing our Lord's discourses as given by this evangelist to be no collections of scattered sayings, but veritable reports of continuous utterances. That the request related in Luke should afterwards have been made, and similarly answered, is by no means improbable. (That he should have thus related it with this gospel before him, is more than improbable.) 2. It has been questioned whether the prayer was regarded in the very earliest times as a set form delivered for liturgical use by our Lord. The variations in Luke have been regarded as fatal to the supposition of its being used liturgically at the time when these Gospels were written. But see notes on Luke xi. 1. It must be confessed, that we find very few traces of such use in early times. Thol. remarks, "It does not occur in the Acts, nor in any writers before the third century. In Justin Mart. we find, that the προσευχὴ prays 'according to his power' (Apol. i. 67, p. 83, ὁ πρ. εὐχὰς ὁμοίως κ. εὐχαριστίας ὅση δύναμις αὐτῷ ἀνατίπτει) Cyprian and Tert. make the first mention of the prayer as an 'oratio legitima et ordinaria.'" An allusion to it has been supposed to exist in 2 Tim. iv. 18, where see note.

3. The view of some that our Lord gave this, selecting it out of forms known and in use, as a prayer ad interim, till the effusion of the Spirit of prayer, is inadmissible, as we have no traces of any such temporary purpose in our Saviour's discourses, and to suppose any such would amount to nothing less than to set them entirely aside. On the contrary, one work of the Holy Spirit on the disciples was, to bring to their mind all things whatsoever He had said unto them, the depth of such sayings only then first being revealed to them by Him who took of the things of Christ and shewed them to them. John xiv. 26.

οὕτως] παράδιδωσι ἑαυτὸν εὐχῆς, εὐχὴν ἵνα ταύτην μόνην τὴν εὐχὴν εὐχόμεθα, ἀλλ' ἵνα ταύτην ἔχοντες πηγὴν εὐχῆς ἐκ ταύτης ἀρνούμεθα τὰς ἐννοίας τῶν εὐχῶν. Euthym. Considering that other manners of praying have been spoken of above, the βαρτολογία and the πολυλογία, the οὕτως, especially in its present position of primary emphasis, cannot well be otherwise understood than thus, i. e. 'in these words,' as a specimen of the Christian's prayer (the ὑμεῖς holds the second place in emphasis), no less than its pattern. This which would be the inference from the context here, is decided for us by Luke xi. 2, ὅταν προσεύχησθε, λήγετε.

Πάτερ ἡμῶν] This was a form of address almost unknown to the Old Covenant: now and then hinted at, as reminding the children of their rebellion (Isa. i. 2. Mal. i. 6), or mentioned as a last resource of the orphan and desolate creature (Isa. lxxiii. 16); but never brought out in its fulness, as indeed it could not be, till He was come by whom we have received the adoption of sons.

Chrysost. Hom. xix. p. 250.

ὁ ἐν τοῖς οὐρανοῖς] These opening words of the Lord's Prayer set clearly before us the status of the Christian, as believing in, depending upon, praying to, a real objective personal God, lifted above himself; to approach whom he must lift up his heart, as the eye is lifted up from earth to heaven. This strikes at the root of all pantheistic error, which regards the spirit of man as identical with the Spirit of God, —and at the root of all Deism; testifying as it does our relation to and covenant dependence on our heavenly Father.

The local heavens are no further to be thought of here, than as Scripture, by a parallelism of things natural and spiritual deeply implanted in our race (compare Aristotle, περί οὐρ. i. 3, πάντες γὰρ ἄνθρωποι περὶ θεῶν ἔχουσιν ὑπόληψιν, καὶ πάντες τὸν ἀνωτάτω θεῖον τόπον ἀποιδόασιν καὶ βάρβαροι καὶ Ἕλληνες οὐκ οἶμαι εἶναι νομίζουσι θεός, δηλονότι ὡς τῷ ἀθανάτῳ τὸ ἀθάνατον συνηρημένον), universally speaks of heaven and heavenly, as applying to the habitation and perfections of the High and Holy One who inhabiteth Eternity.

ἁγιασθήτω τὸ ὄνομά σου] De Wetze observes: 'God's Name is not merely His appellation, which we speak with the mouth, but also and principally the idea which we attach to it,—His Being, as far as it is confessed, revealed or known.' The 'Name of God' in Scripture is used to signify that revelation of Himself which He has made to men, which is all that we know of Him (ὄνομα τοῖνον ἐστὶ κεφαλαιώδης προσηγορία τῆς ἰδίας ποιότητος τοῦ ὀνομαζομένου παραστατικῇ. Orig. [Thol.]): into the depths of His Being, as it is, no human soul can penetrate. See John xvii. 6: Rom. ix. 17. ἁγιάσω here is in the sense of keep holy, sanctify in our hearts, as in ref. 1 Pet. τὰ σερᾶφιμ δοξάζοντα οὕτως ἔλεγον Ἅγιος ἅγιος ἅγιος, ὥστε τὸ ἁγιασθήτω τοῦτό ἐστι δοξασθήτω. Chrys. Hom. xix. p. 250.

10. ἐλθέτω ἡ βασιλεία σου] 'Ut in nobis veniat, optamus; ut in illo inveniamur, optamus.' Aug. Sermon. lvi. c. 4. Thy kingdom here is the fulness of the accomplishment of the kingdom of God, so often spoken of in prophetic Scripture; and by implication, all that process of events which lead to that accomplishment. Meyer, in objecting to all ecclesiastical and spiritual meanings of 'Thy kingdom,' forgets that the one for which he contends exclusively, the Messianic kingdom, does in fact include or imply them all.

γεννηθήτω τ. θ. σου] i. e. not, 'may our will be absorbed into thy will;' but may it be conformed to and subordinated to thine. The literal rendering is, Let thy will be done, as in heaven, (so) also on earth.

These last words, ὡς ἐν οὐρανῷ καὶ ἐπὶ γῆς, may be regarded as applying to the whole of the three preceding petitions, as punctuated in the text. A slight objection may perhaps be found in the circumstance, that the kingdom of God cannot be said to have come in heaven, seeing that it has always been fully established there, and thus the accuracy of correspondence in the particulars will be marred. It is true, this may be escaped by understanding, May thy kingdom come on earth, so as to be as fully established, as it is already in heaven. So that I conceive we are at liberty to take the prayer either way.

11. τὸν ἄρτ. κ.τ.λ.] ἡμῶν—as 'created for us,' 'provided for our use by Thee:' τὸν δι' ἡμᾶς γινόμενον, Euthym. The word ἐπιούσιον has been very variously explained. Origen says of it, πρῶτον δὲ τοῦτ' ἱστέον, ὅτι ἡ λέξις ἡ ἐπιούσιος παρ' οὐδενὶ τῶν Ἑλλήνων οὐτε τῶν σοφῶν ὠνόμασται, οὐτε ἐν τῇ τῶν ἰδιωτῶν συνηθείᾳ τίτρεται, ἀλλ' εἰσὶ κεκλήσθαι ὑπὸ τῶν εὐαγγελιστῶν. The derivations and meanings given may be thus classified (after Tholuck). I. ἐπὶ, εἶναι: and that, either (1) from the participle, as παρουσία, μετουσία, κερουσία, or (2) from the subst. οὐσία. Against both, an objection is brought that thus it would be ἐπουσ. not ἐπιουσ.; but this is not decisive; we have ἐποκτος and ἐπιποκτος, ἐπιανδάνω, ἐπιουρα, &c. Against (2) it is alleged that adjectives from substantives in -a and -ia end in -αιος or -ώδης—ωραῖος, ἀγοραῖος, βίαιος, and from οὐσία not οὐσιος but οὐσιώδης: συνουσιος, περιουσιος, not being from οὐσία but from the fem. particip. But this is not always so: we have πρωγόνιος from γωνία, ὀπίκεισιος from ἐξουσία, and ἐνούσιος and ἐξούσιος from οὐσία:—while πριοῦσιος itself is derived by some from οὐσία. II. ἐπὶ, εἶναι: and that, either (1) from the fem. part. ἡ ἐπιούσα, understanding ἡμέρα, or (2) from δ ἐπιών, understanding χρόνος. (1) has much apparently in its favour. In the N. T., LXX, and Josephus, ἡ παρούσα, ἡ προεῖστος, and this expression itself are often found in this elliptic sense, Jerome found for this word, in the Gospel according to the Hebrews, "mahar (מחר) quod dicitur crastinus." [So also crastinus copt.] The objection brought against it (Salmas. Suicer), that, viz., from the analogy of δυνήσας, τριήσας, τετρήσας, &c. does not seem valid to disprove the existence of the more general possessive adj. in -ος. But the great objection to this derivation is in the sense: which would then be in direct opposition to ver. 34. Nor does it answer this to say, that by making to-morrow's bread the subject of prayer we divest ourselves of anxiety respecting it; since our Lord's command is not to feel that anxiety at all. The same objection will apply to (2) δ ἐπιών χρόνος, or to giving (as Grot. al.) a wider sense to ἡ ἐπιούσα, as meaning all future time, according to the Hebr. usage of מחר. [Cf. venturum or venientem sah.] Nor will σήμερον bear the Hebraistic interpretation of 'from day to day,' מן היום עד היום. Add to this that independently of the discrepancy with ver. 34, Salmasius's objection to this sense, 'quid est ineptius, quam panem crastini diei (and we may say à fortiori 'omnis futuri temporis') nobis quotidie postulare?' seems to me unanswerable. Returning then to the derivation from εἶναι, which has in its favour the authority of the Greek fathers, especially of Origen, and of the Peschito [indigentia nostra], Tholuck thinks it most probable that it is formed after the analogy of περιούσιος, from the substantive οὐσία. The substantive signifies not merely existence (as alleged in the 1st edn. of this work), but also substance, compare Luke xv. 12, where τὸ ἐπιβάλλον μέρος τῆς οὐσίας is a curious illustration of this word. And even were οὐσία existence only, it would still be open for us to take the meaning of the Greek fathers, δ ἐπὶ τῇ οὐσίᾳ ἡμῶν κ. συστάσει τῆς ζωῆς συμβαλλόμενος,—Theophylact: similarly Chr., Basil, Greg. Nys., and Suidas, and the Etym. Mag. Thus ἐπιούσιος will be required for our subsistence—proper for our sustenance, after the analogy of ἐπιγάμος, 'fit for marriage,' ἐπιδόκιμος,

'proper for the banquet,' &c. So that δ ἄφες δ ἐπιούσιος will be equivalent to St. James's τὰ ἐπιτήδεια τοῦ σώματος (ii. 16), and the expressions are rendered in Syr. by the same word. Thus only, σήμερον has its proper meaning. The τὸ καθ' ἡμέραν in Luke xi. 3 is different; see there. It yet remains to enquire how far the expression may be understood spiritually—of the Bread of Life. The answer is easy: viz. that we may safely thus understand it, provided we keep in the foreground its primary physical meaning, and view the other as involved by implication in that. To explain ἐπιούσιος (as Orig. Cyr.-jer.), δ ἐπὶ τὴν οὐσίαν τῆς ψυχῆς καταρασσόμενος, and understand the expression of the Eucharist primarily, or even of spiritual feeding on Christ, is to miss the plain reference of the petition to our daily physical wants. But not to recognize those spiritual senses, is equally to miss the great truth, that the ἡμεῖς whose bread is prayed for, are not mere animals, but composed of body, soul, and spirit, all of which want daily nourishment by Him from whom all blessings flow. See the whole subject treated in Tholuck (pp. 353—371): from whom much of this note is taken. Augustine well says (Serm. lviii. c. 4): 'Quicquid animæ nostræ et carni nostræ in hac vita necessarium est, quotidiano pane concluditur.' The Vulg. rendering, supersubstantialem [substituted for the old lat. quotidianum], tallies with a large class of patristic interpretations which understand the word to point exclusively to the spiritual food of the Word and Sacraments. 12. τὰ ὀφείλ.] i. e. sins, short-comings, and therefore 'debts' = παραπτώματα, ver. 14. Augustine remarks (contra Epist. Parmeniani, l. ii. c. 10): 'Quod utique non de illis peccatis dicitur quæ in baptismi regeneratione dimissæ sunt, sed de iis quæ quotidie de seculi amarissimis fructibus humanæ vitæ infirmitas contrahit.' ὡς καὶ] Not 'for we also,' &c. (as in Luke, καὶ γὰρ αὐτοὶ ὅφ.) nor 'in the same measure as we also,' &c. but like as (quippe; not exactly nam, cf. Klotz ad Devar. p. 766. Hartung, Partikellehre, i. p. 460) we also, &c.; implying similarity in the two actions, of kind, but no comparison of degree. See especially the first ref., where manifestly while the kind of act was the same, the degrees were widely different. 'Augustine uses the testimony of this

13.] The sentiment is not in any way inconsistent with the Christian's joy when he πειρασμοῖς περιπίσῃ ποικίλοις, James i. 2, but is a humble self-distrust and shrinking from such trial in the prospect. As Euthym. says: παιδεύει ἡμᾶς ὁ λόγος μὴ θαρρεῖν ἑαυτοῖς, μὴδ' ἐπιπηδῆν τοῖς πειρασμοῖς ὑπὸ θαρρότητος . . . μὴ ἱπαγομένους μὲν τῶν πειρασμῶν παραιρητίον αὐτοῦς ἱπαγομένων δὲ ἀνδριστίον. The leading into temptation must be understood in its plain literal sense: see ποιήσι σὺν τῷ πειρασμῷ καὶ τὴν ἐξουσίαν, 1 Cor. x. 13. There is no discrepancy with James i. 13, which speaks not of the providential bringing about of, but the actual solicitation of, the temptation. Some (e.g. Isid. Pelus. on ch. xvii. 41, Thl. on Luke xxii. 46, Aug., Bengel, al.) have attempted to fix on εἰσενέγκῃς and εἰσελθεῖν εἰς πειρ. the meaning of bringing into the power of, and entering into, so as to be overcome by, temptation. But this surely the words will not bear. ἀλλά must not be taken as equivalent to εἰ δὲ μὴ, q. d. 'but if thou dost, deliver,' &c.; but is rather the opposition to the former clause, and forms in this sense, but one petition with it,—'bring us not into conflict with evil, nay rather deliver (rid) us from it altogether.' In another view, however, as expressing the deep desire of all Christian hearts to be delivered from all evil (for τοῦ πονηροῦ is here certainly neuter, though taken masculine by Chrys., Thl., Erasmus, Beza, al.; the introduction of the mention of 'the evil one' would seem here to be incongruous. Besides, compare the words of St. Paul, 2 Tim iv. 18, which look very like a reminiscence of this prayer: see note there) these words form a seventh and most affecting petition, reaching far beyond the last. They are the expression of the yearning for redemption of the sons of God (Rom. viii. 23), and so are fitly placed at the end of the prayer, and as the sum and substance of the personal petitions. So Augustine very beautifully says (Ep. ad Probam. cap. xi.): "Cum dicimus libera nos a malo, nos admonemus cogitare, nondum nos esse in eo bono, ubi nullum patiemur malum. Et hoc quidem ultimum quod in dominica oratione positum est, tam late patet, ut homo Christianus in qualibet tribulatione constitutus in hoc gemitus edat, in hoc lacrymas fundat, hinc exordiat, in hoc immoretur, ad hoc terminet orationem."

The doxology must on every ground of sound criticism be omitted. Had it formed part of the original text, it is absolutely inconceivable that all the ancient authorities should with one consent have omitted it. They could have had no reason for doing so; whereas the habit of terminating liturgical prayers with ascriptions of praise would naturally suggest some such ending, and make its insertion almost certain in course of time. And just correspondent to this is the evidence in the var. readd. We find absolutely no trace of it in early times, in any family of MSS. or in any expositors. The Peschito has it, but whether it always had, is another question. Stier eloquently defends its insertion, but solely on subjective grounds: maintaining that the prayer is incomplete without it, and asserting the right of such "innerer Kritik" to over-ride all evidence whatever. It is evident that thus we should have no fixed principles at all by which to determine the sacred text: for what seems to one critic appropriate and necessary, is in the view of another an incongruous addition. It is quite open for us to regard it with Euthymius as τὸ παρὰ τῶν θείων φωστήρων κ. τ. ἐκκλησίας καθηγητῶν προστεθὲν δευρολεύτιον ἐπιφώνημα, and to retain it as such in our liturgies; but in dealing with the sacred text we must not allow any a priori considerations, of which we are such poor judges, to outweigh the almost unanimous testimony of antiquity. The inference to be drawn from the words

But he seems too hastily to have assumed the meaning in the passage from Stobæus : for there the verb may just as well signify covering, plastering over, as disfiguring. The Etym. Magn. says αφανισαι, οι παλαι ουχι το μολυναι ως νυν, αλλα το τελως αφανη ποιησαι. Suidas, on the other hand, αφανισαι ου το μολυναι και χρᾶναι δηλοι, αλλα το ανελειν και αφανης ποιησαι : but it is possible that he may be speaking of its classical sense, as suggested by Le Clerc, who does not however, as Tholuck asserts, cite any examples of the other meaning.

17.] i. e. 'appear as usual' : 'seem to men the same as if thou wert not fasting.' It has been observed that this precept applies only to voluntary and private fasts, (such as are mentioned Luke xviii. 12.) not to public and enjoined ones. But this distinction does not seem to be necessary ; the one might afford just as much occasion for ostentation as the other.

19—24.] From cautions against the hypocrisy of formalists, the discourse naturally passes to the entire dedication of the heart to God, from which all duties of the Christian should be performed. In this section this is enjoined, 1. (vv. 19—24) with regard to earthly treasures, from the impossibility of serving God and Mammon : 2. (vv. 25—34) with regard to earthly cares, from the assurance that our Father careth for us.

The comparison is found in Aristotle, Topic i. 14 (Wetst.), ὡς ὁφεί ἐν ὀφθαλμῷ, νοῦς ἐν ψυχῇ: in Galen, and Philo de Mund. Opif.

εἰ οὖν σ.τ.λ.] If then the light which is in thee is darkness, how dark must the darkness be! i. e. 'if the conscience, the eye and light of the soul, be darkened, in how much grosser darkness will all the passions and faculties be, which are of themselves naturally dark!' The opposition is between τὸ φῶς and τὸ σκότος. This interpretation is borne out by the Vulgate: 'Ipsae tenebrae quantae erunt!' by Jerome: 'Si sensus, qui lumen est, animae vitio caligatur, ipsae putas caligo quantis tenebris obvolvatur!' and by Chrysostom: ὅταν γὰρ ὁ κυβερνήτης ὑποβόχιος γίνηται, καὶ ὁ λύχνος βεβηθῇ, καὶ ὁ ἡγεμὼν αἰχμάλωτος γίνηται, ποία λοιπὸν ἴσται τοῖς ὑπηκόοις ἰλιπς; Hom. xi. p. 264, and Euthymius: εἰ οὖν τὸ φῶς τὸ ἐν σοὶ, ὃ ἴσται ὁ νοῦς, ὃ δωρηθεὶς εἰς τὸ φωτίζειν καὶ ὁδηγεῖν τὴν ψυχὴν, σκότος ἴσται, τουτίστιν ἰσκότισται, λοιπὸν τὸ σκότος, τὸ ἀπὸ τῶν παθῶν, πόσον ἴσται, εἰς τὸ σκοτίζειν τὴν ψυχὴν, σκοτισθὲν τοῦ ἀναγίλλοντος αὐτῇ φωτός. Augustine (de Sermon. Dom. ii. § 46) renders it similarly, but understands σκότος to refer to a different thing: 'Si ipsa cordis

So too the Syr. ssth. versions; and Erasmus: "Si ratio excacata id iudicat imprimis esse expectandum, quod vel contemnendum, vel neglectui habendum, in quas tenebras totum hominem rapit ambitio reliquaeque animi perturbationes, quae suapte natura caliginem habent!"—Bucer, Luther. Stier expands this well, Reden Jesu, i. 206, edn. 2, "As the body, of itself a dark mass, has its light from the eye, so we have here compared to it the sensuous, bestial life (ψυχικόν) of men, their appetites, desires, and aversions, which belong to the lower creature. This dark region—human nature under the gross dominion of the flesh—shall become spiritualized, enlightened, sanctified, by the spiritual light: but if this light be darkness, how great must then the darkness of the sensuous life be!" The usual modern interpretation makes τὸ σκότος πόσον a mere expression of the greatness of the darkness thereby occasioned, and thus loses the force of the sentence.

24.] And this division in man's being cannot take place—he is and must be one—light or dark—serving God or Mammon.

δουλεῖν] Not merely 'serve,' but in that closer sense in which he who serves is the δούλος of, i. e. belongs to, and obeys entirely. ὁ ἰὼβ πλουσίος ἦν· ἀλλ' οὐκ ἰδοῦλαι τῷ μαμωνᾷ, ἀλλ' εἶχεν αὐτός καὶ ἐσπράται, καὶ δεσπότης, οὐ δούλος ἦν. Chrysost. Hom. xxi. p. 269. See Rom. vi. 16, 17.

εἰς and ὁ ἑτερος keeping their individual reference in both members. μιστὶν and ἀγαπᾶν must be given their full meaning, or the depth of the saying is not reached:
 the sense 'minus diligo, posthabeo' (Bret-schneider) for μιστὶν would not bring out the opposition and division of the nature of man by the attempt. μαμωνᾶ] Chaldee, מַמְוֶנָה, (from יָמַן, confusus est), riches.
 'Congruit et Punicum nomen, nam lucrum Punice mammon dicitur.' August. in loc.
 Mammon does not appear to have been the name of any Syrian deity, as Schleusner asserts. Tholuck has shewn that the idea rests only on the testimony of Papias, an obscure grammarian of the eleventh century. Schl. refers to Tertullian, who, however, says nothing of the kind (see adv.
 Marc. iv. 93, which must be the place meant, but not specified by Schl.).

25. διὰ τοῦτο] A direct inference from the foregoing verse: the plainer, since μεριμνῶν (the root being μερίζω) is 'to be distracted,' 'to have the mind drawn two ways.' The E. V., 'Take no thought,' does not express the sense, but gives rather an exaggeration of the command, and thus makes it unreal and nugatory.
 Be not anxious, would be far better. In Luke xii. 29 we have μὴ μεριμνῆσθε, where see note. τῇ ψυχῇ = περὶ τῆς ψυχῆς, dat. commodi. See ver. 28.

οὐχὶ ἡ ψ.] τοῦτο εἶπε δηλῶν ὅτι δ τὸ πλείον δοθεῖ ἡμῖν καὶ τὸ λατρεῖν δώσι.
 πλείον δὲ τὸ μῖζον λίγει. Euthymius.

26. τὰ περ.] The two examples, of the birds and the lilies, are not parallel in their application. The first is an argument from the less to the greater; that our heavenly Father, who feeds the birds, will much more feed us: the second, besides this application, which (ver. 30) it also contains, is a reproof of the vanity of anxiety about clothing, which, in all its pomp of gorgeous colours, is vouchsafed to the inferior creatures, but not attainable by, as being unworthy of, us. Notice, it is not said, μὴ σπεύρετε—μὴ θεριζετε—μὴ συνάγετε;—the birds are not our example to follow in their habits, for God hath made us to differ from them—the doing all these things is part of our πόσις μᾶλλον διαφέρειν, (Luke xii. 24,) and increases the force of the à fortiori; but it is said, μὴ μεριμνᾶτε—μὴ μεριμνῆσθε.

 τί γοῦν ὠφελήσεις οὕτως ἐπιτεταμένως δ πατὴρ ἡμῶν, not αὐτῶν:—thus by every accessory word does our Lord wonderfully assert the truths and proprieties of creation, in which we, his sons, are His central work, and the rest for us. τοῦ οὐρ., and afterwards τοῦ ἀγροῦ, as Thol. remarks, are not superfluous, but serve to set forth the wild and uncaring freedom of the birds and plants. I may add,—also to set forth their lower rank in the scale of creation, as de-longing to the air and the field. Who could say of mankind, οἱ ἄνθρωποι τοῦ κόσμου? Thus the à fortiori is more plainly brought out. 27.] These words do not relate to the stature, the adding a cubit to which (= a foot and a half) would be a very great addition, instead of a very small one, as is implied here, and expressed in Luke xii. 26, εἰ οὖν σὺ ἐν ἐλάχιστοις δύνασθαι, κ.τ.λ.,—but to the time of life of each hearer; as Theophylact on Luke xii. 26, ζωῆς μέτρα παρὰ μέτρον τῷ θῷ, καὶ οὐκ αὐτὸς τις ἵστατο; ἐαυτῷ ὁριστῆς τῆς ζωῆς. So Hammond, Wolf, Rosenm., Kuinoel, Olsh., De Wette, Meyer, Stier, Tholuck, &c. &c. : and the context seems imperatively to require it; for the object of food and clothing is not to enlarge the body, but to prolong life. The application of measures of space to time is not uncommon. See Ps. xxxix. 5 : Job ix. 25 : 2 Tim. iv. 7. In Stobæus, xcvi. 18, we have cited from Mimnermus, ἡμεῖς δ' οὐδ' αὖτε φύλλα φέμι πολυάνθεμος ἄρη | ἔαρος, δ' ῥ' αἰψ' ἀγῆ ἀξέεται ἡελίου, [τοῖς ἱελοῖς, πῆχυνον ἐπὶ χρόνον ἀνθεσιν ἥβης | τερπόμεθα. Alcaeus (Athen. x. 7) says, δάκρυλος ἀμέρα : and Diog. Laert. viii. 16 (Thol.) σπιθαμὴ τοῦ βίου.

²⁸.] καταμάθετε, implying more attention than ἐμβλέψατε : the birds fly by, and we can but look upon them : the flowers are ever with us, and we can watch their growth. These lilies have been supposed to be the crown imperial, (fritillaria imperialis, κρίνον βασιλικόν, Χαίτηθρον,) which grows wild in Palestine, or the amaryllis lutea, (Sir J. E. Smith, cited by F. M.,) whose golden liliaceous flowers cover the autumnal fields of the Levant. Dr. Thomson, "the Land and the Book," p. 256, believes the Huleh lily to be meant : "it is very large, and the three inner petals meet above, and form a gorgeous canopy, such as art never approached, and king never sat under, even in his utmost glory. And when I met this incomparable flower, in all its loveliness, among the oak woods around the northern base of Tabor, and on the hills of Nazareth, where our Lord spent His youth, I felt assured that it was this to which He referred." Probably, however, the word here may be taken in a wider import, as signifying all wild flowers: we is not interrogative, but relative : how they grow.

²⁹.] We here have the declaration of the Creator Himself concerning the relative glory and beauty of all human pomp, compared with the meanness of His own works. See 2 Chron. ix. 15—28. And the meaning hidden beneath the text should not escape the student. As the beauty of the flower is unfolded by the Divine Creator-Spirit from within, from the laws and capacities of its own individual life, so must all true adornment of man be unfolded from within by the same Almighty Spirit. See 1 Pet. iii. 3, 4. As nothing from without can defile a man, (ch. xv. 11,) so neither can any thing from without adorn him. Our Lord introduces with λέγω ὑμῖν His revelations of omniscience : see ch. xviii. 10, 19.

δικαιοσύνην] Not here the forensic righteousness of justification, but the spiritual purity inculcated in this discourse. τὴν δικ. αὐτοῦ answers to ἡ τελειότης αὐτοῦ, spoken of in ch. v. 48, and is another reference to the being as our Heavenly Father is. In the Christian life which has been since unfolded, the righteousness of justification is a necessary condition of likeness to God; but it is not the δικ. αὐτ. here meant. ταῦτα πάντα, these things, all of them—the emphasis being on the genus—all such things; πάντα ταῦτα, all these things—the whole of the things mentioned—the emphasis being on πάντα,—the fact that all without exception are included. See Winer, § 18. 4.

προσθεῖ.] There is a traditional saying of our Lord, αἰεὶ εἰς τὰ μέγιστα, καὶ τὰ μικρὰ ὑμῖν προστεθήσεται· καὶ αἰεὶ εἰς τὰ ἰσχυρά, καὶ τὰ ἐπίγεια προστεθήσεται ὑμῖν. Fabric. Cod. Apocr. i. 329. (Meyer.) 34. ἡ γὰρ αἰψ.] for the morrow will care for it, viz. for ἡ αὐρίον mentioned above: i. e., will bring care enough about its own matters: implying,—‘after all your endeavour to avoid worldly cares, you will find quite enough, and more of them when to-morrow comes, about to-morrow itself: do not then increase those of to-day by introducing them before their time.’ A hint, as is the following κακία, that in this state of sin and infirmity the command of ver. 31 will never be completely observed.

ἀρκετον—κακία: thus, οὐκ ἀγαθὸν πολυκοιμᾶν, II. β. 204. And the same construction frequently occurs, both in Greek and Latin authors.

CHAP. VII. 1—12.] Of our CONDUCT TOWARDS OTHER MEN: parenthetically illustrated, vv. 7—11, by the benignity and wisdom of God in his dealings with us. The connexion with the last chapter is immediately, the word κακία, in which a glance is given by the Saviour at the misery and sinfulness of human life at its best;—and now precepts follow, teaching us how we are to live in such a world, and among others sinful like ourselves:—mediately, and more generally, the continuing caution against hypocrisy, in ourselves and in others.

1.] This does not prohibit all judgment (see ver. 20, and 1 Cor. v. 12); but, as Augustine (de Serm. Dom. ii. § 59) says, ‘Hoc loco nihil aliud nobis præcipi existimo, nisi ut ea facta quæ dubium est quo animo fiant, in meliorem partem interpretemur.’

κρίνειν has been taken for κατακρίνειν here (εἰς τὴν ἐνταῦθα τὴν κατακρίσιν νόσον. Enthym. So also Theophylact, Tholuck, Olshausen); and this seems necessary, at least in so far that κρίνειν should be taken as implying an ill judgment. For if the command were merely ‘not to form authoritative judgments of others’ (as given in edn. 1 of this work), the second member, ἵνα μὴ κριθῇτε, would not, in its right interpretation, as applying to God’s judgment of us, correspond. And the μὴ καταδικάζετε, which follows in Luke vi. 37, is perhaps to be taken rather as an exegesis of κρίνετε, than as a climax after it. κριθήσε] i. e. 'by God,' for so doing;—a parallel expression to ch. v. 7; vi. 15; not 'by others.' The bare passive, without the agent expressed, and without καί to refer it back to the former member of the clause, is solemn and emphatic. See note on Luke vi. 38; xvi. 9; and xii. 20. The sense then is, 'that you have not to answer before God for your rash judgment and its consequences.' The same remarks apply to ver. 2. 2.] ἐν, not instrumental, but of the sphere in which the act takes place, i. e. in this case, the measure, according to which: as in ref. 2 Cor., ἐν ἑαυτοῖς ἑαυτοὺς μετροῦντες. 3—5.] Lightfoot produces instances of this proverbial saying among the Jews. With them, however, it seems only to be used of a person retaliating rebuke. 'Dixit Rabbi Tarphon, Miror ego, an sit in hoc seculo, qui recipere vult correptionem; quin si dicat quis alteri, Ejice stramen ex oculo tuo, responsurus ille est, Ejice trabem ex oculo tuo:'—whereas our Lord gives us a further application of it, viz. to the incapability of one involved in personal iniquity to form a right judgment on others, and the clearness given to the spiritual vision by conflict with and victory over evil. There is also no doubt here a lesson given us of the true relative magnitude which our own faults, and those of our brother, ought to hold in our estimation. What is a κάρφος to one looking on another, is to that other himself a δοκός: just the reverse of the ordinary estimate. τὸ κάρφ. and ἡ δοκ., not as referring to a known proverb, but because the mote and beam are in situ, ἐν τῷ ὀφθαλμῷ. βλέπεις, beholdest, from without, a voluntary act: σὺ κατανοεῖς, apprehendest not, from within, that which is already there, and ought to have excited attention before. The same distinction is observed in Luke. 4.] πῶς ἐρεῖς = πῶς δύνασαι λῆγειν, Luke; wie darfst du sagen, Luther. 5. ὑποκριτὰ] ὑποκριτὴν τὸν τοιοῦτον ἐνόμασαν ὡς ἱατροῦ μὴν τάμην ἀρπάζοντα, νοσοῦντος δὲ τόπον ἐπὶ χεῖρα: ἡ ὡς προφάσει μὴν διαρθώσεως τὸ ἀλλότριον σφάλμα πολυπραγμανοῦντα, σκοπῇ δὲ κατακρίσεις τοῦτο ποιοῦντα. Euthym. διαβλ., as in E. V., thou shalt see clearly, with purified eye. The close is remarkable. Before, βλέπεις τὸ κάρφος was all—to stare at thy brother's faults, and as people do who stand and gaze at an object, attract others to gaze also—but now, the object is a very different one—ἐκβαλεῖν τὸ κάρφος—to help thy brother to be rid of his fault, by doing him the best and most difficult office of Christian friendship. The βλέπεις was vain and idle; the διαβλέπεις is for a blessed end, viz. (ch. xviii. 15) κερδεῖν τὸν ἀδελφόν σου. 6.] The connexion, see below. τὸ ἅγιον] Some have thought this a mis-translation of the Chaldaee, מִן הָאֵרֶץ, an ear-ring, or amulet; but the connexion is not at all improved by it. food of dogs. The similitude is derived from τὸ ἄγιον, or τὰ ἅγια, the meat offered in sacrifice, of which no unclean person was to eat (Lev. xxii. 6, 7, 10, 14 [where τὸ ἄγ. is used], 15, 16). Similarly in the ancient Christian Liturgies and Fathers, τὰ ἅγια are the consecrated elements in the Holy Communion. The fourteenth canon of the Council of Laodiceæ orders μὴ τὰ ἅγια . . . εἰς ἐπίρας παροικίας διατίμεισθαι. Again, Cyril of Jerus.: μετὰ ταῦτα λέγει ὁ κερύς Τὰ ἅγια τοῖς ἁγίοις. ἅγια, τὰ προσέμμενα, ἐπιφοιτήσιν διέδμενα ἁγίου πνεύματος. (See Snicer on the word.) Thus interpreted, the saying would be one full of meaning to the Jews. As Dean Trench observes (Serm. Mount, p. 186), "It is not that the dogs would not eat it, for it would be welcome to them; but that it would be a profanation to give it to them, thus to make it a σκύβαλον, Exod. xxii. 31." The other part of the similitude is of a different character, and belongs entirely to the swine, who having cast to them pearls, something like their natural food, whose value is inappreciable by them, in fury trample them with their feet, and turning against the donor, rend him with their tusks. The connexion with the foregoing and following verses is this: "Judge not," &c.; "at-tempt not the correction of others, when you need it far more yourselves:" still, "be not such mere children, as not to distinguish the characters of those with whom you have to do. Give not that which is holy to dogs," &c. Then, as a humble hearer might be disposed to reply, 'if this last be a measure of the divine dealings, what bounties can I expect at God's hand?' (This, to which Stier objects, R. Jesu i. 233, edn. 2, I must still hold to be the immediate connexion, as shewn by the knowing how to give good gifts, and the instances adduced below.)—(ver. 7), 'ask of God, and He will give to each of you: for this is His own will, that you shall obtain by asking (ver. 8).—good things, good for each in his place and degree (vv. 10, 11), not unwholesome or unfitting things. Therefore (ver. 12) do ye the same to others, as ye wish to be done, and as God does, to you: viz. give that which is good for each, to each, not judging uncharitably on the one hand, nor casting pearls before swine on the other.'

7.] The three similitudes are all to be understood of prayer, and form a climax: ἀπὸ δὲ τοῦ κρούειν τὸ μετὰ σφοδρότητος προσεῖναι καὶ μετὰ θυμῆς ἐναντίας ἰδῆλως. Chrys. Hom. xxiii. p. 289.

8.] The only limitation to this promise, which, under various forms, is several times repeated by our Lord, is furnished in vv. 9—11, and in James iv. 3, αἰτεῖτε καὶ οὐ λαμβάνετε· διότι κακῶς αἰτεῖσθε.

9.] There are two questions here, the first of which is broken off, after an

¹¹. πονηροί i.e. in comparison with God. It is not necessary to suppose a rebuke conveyed here, but only a general declaration of the corruption and infirmity of man. Augustine remarks, in accordance with this view, that the persons now addressed are the same who had been taught to say 'Our Father' just now. ταῦτα δι' ἑλεγειν οὐ διαβάλλων τὴν ἀνθρωπίνην φύσιν οὐδὲ κακίζων τὸ γένος· ἀλλὰ πρὸς ἀντιδιαστολὴν τῆς ἀγαθότητος τῆς αὐτοῦ. Chrys. Hom. xxi. p. 280. Stier remarks, "This saying seems to me the strongest dictum probans for original sin in the whole of the holy scriptures." R. J. i. 236. ἀγαθὰ] principally, His Holy Spirit, Luke xi. 18.

The same argument à fortiori is used by our Lord in the parable of the unjust judge, Luke xviii. 6, 7. ¹².] Trench (Serm. Mount, p. 143) has noticed Augustine's refutation of the sneer of infidels (such as Gibbon's against this precept), that some of our Lord's sayings have been before written by heathen authors. (See examples in Wetst. ad loc.) 'Dixit hoc Pythagoras, dixit hoc Plato . . . Propterea si inventus fuerit aliquis eorum hoc dixisse quod dixit et Christus, gratulamur illi, non sequimur illum. Sed prior fuit ille quam Christus. Si quis vera loquitur, prior est quam ipsa Veritas! O homo, attende Christum, non quando ad te venerit, sed quando te fecerit.' Enarr. in Ps. cxl. 6.

οὖν is the inference indeed from the preceding eleven verses, but immediately from the δώσει ἀγαθὰ τοῖς αἰτοῦσιν αὐτόν just said,—and thus closing this section of the Sermon with a lesson similar to the last verse of ch. v., which is, indeed, the ground-tone of the whole Sermon—'Be ye like unto God.' οὕτως, viz., after the pattern of ὅσα ἂν: not = ταῦτα, because what might suit us, might not suit others. We are to think what we should like done to us, and then apply that rule to our dealings with others: viz., by doing to them what we have reason to suppose they would like done to them. This is a most important distinction, and one often overlooked in the interpretation of this golden maxim.

¹³—²⁷.] THE CONCLUSION OF THE DISCOURSE:—sitting forth more strongly and personally the dangers of hypocrisy, both in being led aside by hypocritical teachers, and in our own inner life.—The πύλη stands at the end of the ὁδός, as in the remarkable parallel in the Table of Cebes,

On the other hand, these verses were his weapon against the shallow Pelagian scheme, which would look at men's deeds apart from the living Root in man out of which they grew, and suppose that man's unaided will is capable of good. 21. The doom of the hypocritical false prophets introduces the doom of all hypocrites, and brings on the solemn close of the whole, in which the hypocrite and the true disciple are parabolically compared.—Observe that here the Lord sets Himself forth as the Judge in the great day, and at the same time speaks not of τὸ θεῖον, μὲν, but τὸ θεῖον τοῦ πατρὸς μὲν: an important and invaluable doctrinal landmark in this very opening of His ministry in the first Gospel. οὐ γὰρ is not here 'no one,' as some (Eisner, Fritzsche) have interpreted it. That meaning would require πᾶς . . . οὐκ εισελύσεται.

The context must rule the meaning of such wide words as λέγει. Here it is evidently used of mere lip homage; but in οὐδὲν δέναναι εἰπαὶν Κόρυς Ἰησοῦς εἰ μὴ ἐν πνεύματι ἀγίῳ, 1 Cor. xii. 3, the "saying" has the deeper meaning of a genuine heartfelt confession.

To seek for discrepancies in passages of this kind implies a predisposition to find them: and is to treat Holy Scripture with less than that measure of candour which we give to the writings of one another.

22. ἐν ἐκείνῃ τῇ ἡμέρᾳ] perhaps refers to ver. 19: or it may be the expression so common in the prophets of the great day of the Lord: e. g. Isa. ii. 20; xiv. 9 al. fr. So the Jews called the great day of judgment "that day," see Schöttgen, Hor. i. p. 82.

τῷ σπῷ ὀνόματι] perhaps = ἐν τ. σ. ο. ὀν., in nomine auctoritatis tuae, but better by thy Name, that name having, as Meyer, filled out our belief and been the object of our confession of faith. The dative in this case is instrumental, cf. Winer, § 31. 7.

ἐπροφητ. preached, not necessarily foretold future events. 1 Cor. xii. 10, and note. On δαυδ. ἐξ. see note on ch. viii. 32.

23.] As the words now stand, ἐγὼ is merely recitative, and cannot be (Meyer) 'because,' belonging to ἀποχωρ. Such an arrangement would be unprecedented. Orig., Chrys., Cyp., &c., placed ἐγὼ οὐδ. ἐγὼ. ὅμ. after ἀποχ., &c., in which case the meaning 'for, because' would be right. See Luke xiii. 25—27.

ὁμολογήσω is here a remarkable word, as a statement of the simple truth of facts, as opposed to the false colouring and self-deceit of the hypocrites—'I will tell them the plain truth,' οὐδέποτε ἐγ. ὅμ., i. e., in the sense

This is also done occasionally by Herodotus, and by Attic prose writers, where euphony is served by it. See Herod. i. 122; iii. 42; ix. 22: and Winer, § 12. 9.

27. μεγάλη] All the greater, because such an one as here supposed is a professed disciple—ἀκούων τοῦ λόγου—and therefore would have the further to fall in case of apostasy.

28. ἦν διδάσκων] The assertion is spread more widely, by this resolved imperfect, over His whole course of teaching. Chrysostom's comment is, οὐ γὰρ εἰς ἕτερον ἀναφέρειν, ὡς ὁ προφήτης καὶ ὁ Μωσῆς, ἵλεγειν ἀπὲρ ἵλεγειν, ἀλλὰ πανταχοῦ ἱαυτὸν ἰνδικοινύμενος εἶναι τὸν τὸ κύριον ἔχοντα. καὶ γὰρ νομοθετῶν συνεχῶς προσετίθει· Ἐγὼ δὲ λέγω ὑμῖν, καὶ τῆς ἡμέρας ἀναμνησέων ἱερίων, ἱαυτὸν ἰδικοινύ τὸν δικάζοντα εἶναι. VIII. 1—4.] HEALING OF A LEPER. Mark i. 40—45: Luke v. 12—14. We have now (in this and the following chapter), as it were a solemn procession of miracles, confirming the authority with which our Lord had spoken. ἀπὸ τῆς διδασκαλίας ἐπὶ τὰ θαύματα μεταβαίνειν. ἐπεὶ γὰρ ὡς ἑξουσίαν ἔχων ἰδικοινύ, ἵνα μὴ νομισθῇ κομπάζειν καὶ ἀλαζονεύεσθαι, διέκρινε τὴν ἑξουσίαν αὐτοῦ καὶ ἐν τοῖς ἔργοις, καὶ βεβαίωσεν τοὺς λόγους ἀπὸ τῶν πράξεων. Euthym.

2.] This same miracle is related by St. Luke without any mark of definiteness, either as to time or place,—καὶ ἐγένετο, ἐν τῷ εἶναι αὐτὸν ἐν μιᾷ τῶν πόλεων . . . In this instance there is, and can be, no doubt that the transactions are identical: and this may serve us as a key-note, by which the less obvious and more intricate harmonies of these two narrations may be arranged. The plain assertion of the account in the text requires that the leper should have met our Lord on His descent from the mountain, while great multitudes were following Him. The accounts in St. Luke and St. Mark require no such fixed date. This narrative therefore fixes the occurrence. I conceive it highly probable that St. Matthew was himself a hearer of the Sermon, and one of those who followed our Lord at this time. From St. Luke's account, the miracle was performed in, or rather, perhaps, in the neighbourhood of, some city: what city, does not appear.

As the leper is in all three accounts related to have come to Jesus (καὶ ἰδὼν implying it in Luke), he may have been outside the city, and have run into it to our Lord. λεπρός] The limits of a note allow of only an abridgment of the most important particulars relating to this disease. Read Leviticus xiii. xiv. for the Mosaic enactments respecting it, and its nature and symptoms. See also Exod. iv. 6: Num. xii. 10: 2 Kings v. 27; xv. 5: 2 Chron. xxvi. 19, 21. The whole ordinances relating to leprosy were symbolical and typical. The disease was not contagious: so that the view which makes them mere sanitary regulations is out of the question. The fact of its non-contagious nature has been abundantly proved by learned men, and is evident from the Scripture itself: for the priests had continually to be in close contact with lepers, even to handling and examining them. We find Naaman, a leper, commanding the armies of Syria (2 Kings v. 1); Gehazi, though a leper, is conversed with by the king of Israel (2 Kings viii. 4, 5); and in the examination of a leper by the priest, if a man was entirely covered with leprosy, he was to be pronounced clean (Levit. xiii. 12, 13). The leper was not shut out from the synagogue (Lightfoot, vol. i. p. 513), nor from the Christian churches (Suicer, Thesaurus Patrum, under λεπρός). Besides, the analogy of the other uncleannesses under the Mosaic law, e. g. having touched the dead, having an issue, which are joined with leprosy (Num. v. 2), shews that sanitary caution was not the motive of these ceremonial enactments, but a far deeper reason. This disease was specially selected, as being the most loathsome and incurable of all, to represent the effect of the defilement of sin upon the once pure and holy body of man. "Leprosy was, indeed, nothing short of a living death, a poisoning of the springs, a corrupting of all the humours, of life; a dissolution, little by little, of the whole body, so that one limb after another actually decayed and fell away." (Trench on the Miracles, p. 213.)

See Num. xii. 12. The leper was the type of one dead in sin: the same emblems are used in his misery as those of mourning for the dead: the same means of cleansing as for uncleanness through connexion with death, and which were never used except on these two occasions. Compare Num. xix. 6, 13, 18, with Levit. xiv. 4—7. All this exclusion and mournful separation imported the perpetual exclusion of the abominable and polluted from the true city of God, as declared Rev. xxi. 27, οὐ μὴ εἰέλθῃ εἰς αὐτὴν πᾶν κοινὸν καὶ ποιεῖν βδελύγμα καὶ ψεῦδος. And David, when after his deadly sin he utters his prayer of penitence, 'Purge me with hyssop, and I shall be clean,' Ps. li. 7, doubtless saw in his own utter spiritual uncleanness, that of which the ceremonial uncleanness that was purged with hyssop was the type. Thus in the above-cited instances we find leprosy inflicted as the punishment of rebellion, lying, and presumption. 'I put the plague of leprosy in an house' (Levit. xiv. 34), 'Remember what the Lord thy God did to Miriam' (Deut. xxiv. 9), and other passages, point out this plague as a peculiar infliction from God. "The Jews termed it 'the finger of God,' and emphatically 'The stroke.' They said that it attacked first a man's house; and if he did not turn, his clothing; and then, if he persisted in sin, himself. So too, they said, that a man's true repentance was the one condition of his leprosy leaving him." Trench, p. 216. The Jews, from the prophecy Isa. liii. 4, had a tradition that the Messiah should be a leper. προσεκύνει] πρὸς αὐτὸν ἰστὶ πρόσωπον, Luke v. 12 [γυνυπεκύνων, Mark i. 40]. These differences of expression are important. See beginning of note on this verse. κύριε] Not here merely a title of respect, but an expression of faith in Jesus as the Messiah. "This is the right utterance of κύριε, which will never be made in vain." Stier. who just now expansively fulfilled the law by word and commands, now does the same by act and deed: the law had forbidden the touching of the leper, Levit. v. 3. It was an act which stood on the same ground as the healing on the Sabbath, of which we have so many instances. So likewise the prophets Elijah and Elisha touched the dead in the working of a miracle on them (1 Kings xvii. 21: 2 Kings iv. 34). The same almighty power which suspends natural laws, supersedes ceremonial laws.

Here is a noble example illustrating His own precept so lately delivered, 'Give to him that asketh thee.' Again, we can hardly forbear to recognize, in His touching the leper, a deed symbolic of His taking on him, touching, laying hold of, our nature. Compare Luke xiv. 4, καὶ ἰπταβόμενος ἴασατο αὐτόν, with Heb. ii. 16, σπέρματος Ἀβραὰμ ἰπταμβόμενα. ¹ θάω.] 'Echo prompta ad fidem leprosi maturam.' Bengel ad loc.

ἐκασθ. αὐτ. ἡ λέπρ.] Luke's words (ver. 13), ἡ λέπρᾳ ἀπῆλθεν ἀπ' αὐτοῦ, are more strictly correct in construction. See also Mark i. 42. A curious instance of the theological littleness which has been shewn in treating our Lord's great acts of Divine Love, is cited here by Dr. Wordsw. from Ambrose: "Dicit 'volo' propter Photinum (who said that our Lord was a mere man): imperat propter Arium (who denied His equality with the Father): tangit propter Manichæum (who said that Christ had not human flesh, but was only a phantom)."

4. ὅρα μηδενὶ εἰπεῖς.] Either (1) these words were a moral admonition, having respect to the state of the man (ιδόσκειν τὸ ἀκόμρασον καὶ ἀφελότιμον, Chrysost.), for the injunction to silence was not our Lord's uniform practice (see Mark v. 19, || L.), and in this case they were of lasting obligation, that the cleansed leper was not to make his healing a matter of boast hereafter; or (2) they were a cautionary admonition, only binding till he should have shewn himself to the priest, in order to avoid delay in this necessary duty, or any hindrance which might, if the matter should first be blazed abroad, arise to his being pronounced clean, through the malice of the priests; or (3), which I believe to be the true view, our Lord almost uniformly repressed the fame of His miracles, for the reason given in ch. xii. 15—21, that, in accordance with prophetic truth, He might be known as the Messiah not by wonder-working power, but by the great result of his work upon earth: οὐκ ἵπρσι, οὐδὲ κραυγᾶσι, οὐδὲ ἀκούσει τις ἐν ταῖς πλατείαις τὴν φωνὴν αὐτοῦ . . . , ἵως ἂν ἐβάλῃ εἰς νίκος τὴν ἐρίον. Thus the Apostles always refer primarily to the Resurrection, and only incidentally, if at all, to the wonders and signs. (Acts ii. 22—24; iii. 13—16.) These latter were tokens of power common to our Lord and his followers; but in His great conflict, ending in His victory, He trod the wine-press alone. σεαυτὸν δειξ. κ.τ.λ.]

Read Levit. xiv. 1—32. This command has been used in support of the theory of satisfaction by priestly confession and penance. But even then (Trench on the Miracles, p. 221) the advocates of it are constrained to acknowledge that Christ alone is the cleanser. 'Ut Dominus ostenderet, quod non sacerdotali iudicio, sed largitate divinis gratias peccato emundatur, leprosum tangendo mundavit, et postea sacerdoti sacrificium ex lege offerre præcepit.' (Gratian de Pœnitentia, Dist. 1.) 'Dominus leprosum sanitare prius per se restituit, deinde ad sacerdotes misit quorum iudicio ostenderetur mundatus . . . quia etiam aliquis apud Deum sit solutus, non tamen in facie Ecclesiæ solutus habetur, nisi per iudicium sacerdotis. In solvendis ergo culpis vel retinendis ita operatur sacerdos evangelicus et iudicat, sicut olim legalis in illis qui contaminati erant lepra quæ peccatum signat.' (Peter Lombard. Sent. l. 4, dist. 18, cited by Trench.) It is satisfactory to observe this drawing of parallels between the Levitical and (popularly so called)

The man disobeyed the injunction, so that our Lord could no more enter the city openly; see Mark i. 45.

8—13.] HEALING OF THE CENTURION'S SERVANT. Luke vii. 1—10, where we have a more detailed account of the former part of this miracle. On the chronological arrangement, see Prolegomena. The centurion did not himself come to our Lord, but sent elders of the Jews to Him, who recommended him to His notice as loving their nation, and having built them a synagogue. Such variations, the concise account making a man fecisse per se what the fuller one relates him fecisse per alterum, are common in all written and oral narrations. In such cases the fuller account is, of course, the stricter one. Augustine, answering Faustus the Manichean, who wished, on account of the words of our Lord in ver. 11, to set aside the whole, and used this variation for that purpose, makes the remark, so important in these days, 'Quid enim, nonne talibus locutionibus humana plena est consuetudo . . . quid ergo, cum legitimus; obliuiscimur quemadmodum loqui soleamus? An Scriptura Dei aliter nobiscum fuerat, quam nostro more, locutura?' Contra Faustum, xxxiii. 7. On the non-identity of this miracle with that in John iv. 46 ff., see note there.

5. ἑκατόνταρχος] he was a Gentile, see ver. 10, but one who was deeply attached to the Jews and their religion; possibly, though this is uncertain, a proselyte of the gate (no such term as σεβόμενος, φοβούμενος τὸν θ. is used of him, as commonly of these proselytes, Acts x. 2 al.).

6. ὁ δαῦς] From Luke we learn that it was δοῦλος, ὃς ἦν αὐτῷ ἐντιμος. The centurion, perhaps, had but one slave, see ver. 9. 'Lucas hoc modo dubitationem prævenit, quæ subire poterat lectorum animos; scimus enim non habitos fuisse servos eo in pretio, ut de ipsorum vitam anxii essent domini, nisi qui singulari industria vel fide vel alia virtute sibi gratiam acquisierant. (Calvin in loc.) §.] The centurion heard that the Lord was coming, Luke vii. 6, and sent friends to Him with this second and still humbler message. He knew and felt himself, as a heathen, to be out of the fold of God, a stranger to the commonwealth of Israel; and therefore unworthy to receive under his roof the Redeemer of Israel.

That this is the right interpretation, is shewn by our Lord's special commendation of his faith, ver. 10, 'volens ostendere Dominum quoque non per adventum tantum corporis, sed per angelorum ministeria posse implere quod vellet.' the occurrence. A tradition of this nature was hardly likely to be wrong; so that perhaps the words ἀκολουθεῖ μοι are to be taken (as in John xxi. 19, 22) as an admonition occasioned by some slackness or symptom of decadence on the part of the Apostle. The attempt to evade the strong words of our Lord's command by supposing that θάψαι τὸν πατέρα means, 'to reside with my father till his death' (Theophylact), is evidently futile, since πρῶτον ἀπελθεῖν καὶ θάψαι is plainly said of an act waiting to be done; and the reason of our Lord's rebuke was the peremptory and all-superseding nature of the command ἀκολουθεῖ μοι. 22. νεκροῖς] First time, as Rev. iii. 1, spiritually,—second, literally dead. The two meanings are similarly used in one saying by our Lord in John xi. 25, 26. See Heb. vi. 1; ix. 14.—ἐκάλυψεν αὐτόν, οὐ κωλύειν τὸ τιμᾶν τοὺς γονεῖς, ἀλλὰ διδάσκων δεῖ χρῆ τὸν ἐκείμενον τῶν οὐρανίων μὴ ὑποστρέφειν εἰς τὰ γήινα, μηδ' ἀπολιμπάνειν μὲν τὰ ζωηρά, καλεῖσθαι δὲ εἰς τὰ νεκρωτικά, μηδὲ θεοῦ προτιμᾶν γονεῖς. ἔγνωσκε γὰρ δεῖ θάψουσι τοῦτον ἄλλοι, καὶ οὐκ εἰκὸς τοῦτον ἀπολειφθῆναι τῶν ἀναγκασιωτέων. οἶμαι δὲ δεῖ καὶ ἀπιστος εἶναι ὁ ῥαλειστήρας. On these and such like variations, notice the following excellent and important remarks of Augustine (De Consensu Ev. ii. 24):

'Una eademque sententia est excitantium Dominum, volentiumque salvari; nec opus est querere quid horum potius Christo dictum sit. Sive enim aliquid horum trium dixerint, sive alia verba quae nullus Evangelistarum commemoravit, tantundem tamen valentia ad eandem sententiae veritatem, quid ad rem interest?' We may well exclaim, 'O si sic omnia!' Much useless labour might have been spared, and men's minds led to the diligent enquiry into the real difficulties of the Gospels, instead of so many spending time in knitting cobwebs. But Augustine himself in the very next sentence, descends to the unsatisfactory ground of the Harmonists, when he adds, 'Quamquam et hoc fieri potuit, ut pluribus eum simul excitantibus, omnia hæc, aliud ab alio, dicerentur.' His mind however was not one to rest contented with such sophisms; and all his deeper and more earnest sayings are in the truer and freer spirit of the above extract. [The above remarks are more than ever important, now that a reaction towards the low literal harmonic view has set in, and the inspiration of the mere letter is set up against those who seek for life in searching the real spirit of the Scriptures. 1862.]

28.] The time of this rebuke in the text precedes, but in Mark and Luke follows, the stilling of the storm. See the last note.

They were of little faith, in that they were afraid of perishing while they had on board the slumbering Saviour: they were not faithless, for they had recourse to that Saviour to help them. Therefore He acknowledges the faith which they had; answers the prayer of faith, by working a perfect calm: but rebukes them for not having the stronger, firmer faith, to trust Him even when He seemed insensible to their danger.

The symbolic application of this occurrence is too striking to have escaped general notice. The Saviour with the company of His disciples in the ship tossed on the waves, seemed a typical reproduction of the Ark bearing mankind on the flood, and a foreshadowing of the Church tossed by the tempests of this world, but having Him with her always. And the personal application is one of comfort, and strengthening of faith, in danger and doubt.

27. οἱ ἄνθρωποι.] The men who were in the ship, besides our Lord and His disciples.

28.] Among the difficulties attendant on this narrative, the situation and name of the place where the event happened are not the least. Origen's remarks are: ἡ περὶ τοῦ ἐπὶ τῶν δαιμονίων κατακηρυζομένης καὶ ἐν τῇ θαλάσσῃ συμπηγόμενης χοίρους οικονομία ἀναγίγνεται γεγονέναι ἐν τῇ χώρῃ τῶν Γερασσηνῶν. "we must speak also to [in reference to] this;" discuss this reading also. Dr. Bloomfield's conjecture, σιτιέται, need only be considered by those who are not aware of this common expression). Γάδαρα γὰρ πόλις μὲν ἐστὶ τῆς Ἰουδαίας, περὶ ἣν τὰ διαβόητα θεοῦ τυγχάνει, λίμνη δὲ κρημνὸς παρακειμένη οὐδαμῶς ἐστὶν ἐν αὐτῇ ἢ θάλασσα. Ἀλλὰ Γέραςα, ἀφ' ἧς οἱ Γεργεσαῖοι, πόλις ἀρχαία περὶ τὴν νῦν καλουμένην Τιβερίδα λίμνην, περὶ ἣν κρημνὸς παρακειμένος τῇ λίμνῃ, ἀφ' οὗ δέκονται τοὺς χοίρους ἐπὶ τῶν δαιμόνων καταβεβλησθαι. Comm. in Joan. tom. vi. vol. iv. p. 269, ed. Migne. Notwithstanding this, it appears very doubtful whether there ever was a town named Gergesha near the lake. There were the Gergashites (Joseph. i. 6. 2) in former days, but their towns had been destroyed by the Israelites at their first irruption, and never, that we hear of, afterwards rebuilt (see Dent. vii. 1: Josh. xiv. 11). Gerasa (now Dacherasch) lies much too far to the East. The town of Gadara, alluded to in the text, was (Joseph. B. J. iv. 7. 3) μητρόπολις τῆς Περαιᾶς κατ' ἐρῶ, and (Euseb. Onomasticon) ἀντιπρὸς Σευθεῖ πόλει καὶ Τιβερίδος πρὸς ἀνατολῆς, ἐν τῇ ὁρί, οὗ πρὸς ταῖς ὑποουργίαις (Dr. Bloomfield in loc. conjectures ὑποουργίαις) τὰ τῶν θεμῶν ἐδάτων λουτρά παρέκεινται. It was on the river Hieromax ('Gaddara Hieromace præfluente,' Plin. v. 18), and sixty stadia from Tiberias (Joseph. Vit. § 66), πόλις Ἑλληνίς (Jos. Antt. xvii. 11. 4). It was destroyed in the civil wars of the Jews, and rebuilt by Pompeius (Jos. B. J. i. 7. 7), presented by Augustus to King Herod (Jos. Antt. xv. 7. 3), and

These, especially the first, would seem to imply that the swine were on the hills, and the scene of the miracle at some little distance, on the plain. 31. ἀνέστρεψεν ἡμ.] St. Mark and St. Luke give, as the ground of this request, that they might not be sent out of the land = into the abyss, i.e. out of their permitted residence on earth to βάσανος πρὸ καιροῦ in the ἀβύσσος. See note and ref. on Luke.

32.] This remarkable narrative brings before us the whole question of DEMONIAL POSSESSIONS in the Gospels, which I shall treat here once for all, and refer to this note hereafter. I would then remark in general, (I. 1) that the Gospel narratives are distinctly pledged to the historic truth of these occurrences. Either they are true, or the Gospels are false. For they do not stand in the same, or a similar position, with the discrepancies in detail, so frequent between the Evangelists : but they form part of that general groundwork in which all agree.

(2) Nor can it be said that they represent the opinion of the time, and use words in accordance with it. This might have been difficult to answer, but that they not only give such expressions as δαιμονιζόμενος, δαιμονισθεῖς (Mark v. 16 : Luke viii. 36), and other like ones, but relate to us words spoken by the Lord Jesus, in which the personality and presence of the demons is distinctly implied. See especially Luke xi. 17—26. Now either our Lord spoke these words, or He did not. If He did not, then we must at once set aside the concurrent testimony of the Evangelists to a plain matter of fact ; in other words establish a principle which will overthrow equally every fact related in the Gospels. If He did, it is wholly at variance with any Christian idea of the perfection of truthfulness in Him who was Truth itself, to suppose Him to have used such plain and solemn words repeatedly, before His disciples and the Jews, in encouragement of, and connivance at, a lying superstition. (3) After these remarks it will be unnecessary to refute that view of demoniacal possession which makes it identical with mere bodily disease,—as is included above ; but we may observe, that it is every where in the Gospels distinguished from disease, and in such a way as to shew that, at all events, the two were not in that day confounded. (See ch. ix. 32, 33, and compare Mark vii. 32.) (4) The question then arises, Granted the plain historical truth of demoniacal possession, WHAT WAS IT? This question, in the suspension, or withdrawal, of the gift of 'discerning of spirits' in the modern Church, is not easy to answer. But we may gather from the Gospel narratives some important ingredients for our description. The demoniac was one whose being was strangely interpenetrated ('possessed' is the most exact word that could be found) by one or more of those fallen spirits, who are constantly asserted in Scripture (under the name of δαίμονες, δαιμόνια, πνεύματα πονηρά, πνεύματα ἀσθάρτα, their chief being ὁ διάβολος or σατανᾶς) to be the enemies and tempters of the souls of men. (See Acts v. 3 ; John xiii. 2 and passim.) He stood in a totally different position from the abandoned wicked man, who morally is given over to the devil. This latter would be a subject for punishment ; but the demoniac for deepest compassion. There appears to have been in him a double will and double consciousness—sometimes the cruel spirit thinking and speaking in him, sometimes his poor crushed self crying out to the Saviour of men for mercy : a terrible advantage taken, and a personal realization, by the malignant powers of evil, of the fierce struggle between sense and conscience in the man of morally divided life. Hence it has been

not improbably supposed, that some of these demoniacs may have arrived at their dreadful state through various progressive degrees of guilt and sensual abandonment. 'Lavish sin, and especially indulgence in sensual lusts, superinducing, as it would often, a weakness in the nervous system, which is the especial band between body and soul, may have laid open these unhappy ones to the fearful incursions of the powers of darkness.' (Trench on the Miracles, p. 160.) (5) The frequently urged objection, How comes it that this malady is not now among us? admits of an easy answer, even if the assumption be granted. The period of our Lord's being on earth was certainly more than any other in the history of the world under the dominion of evil. The foundations of man's moral being were broken up, and the 'hour and power of darkness' prevailing. Trench excellently remarks, 'It was exactly the crisis for such soul-maladies as these, in which the spiritual and bodily should be thus strangely inter-linked, and it is nothing wonderful that they should have abounded at that time; for the predominance of certain spiritual maladies at certain epochs of the world's history, which were specially fitted for their generation, with their gradual decline and disappearance in others less congenial to them, is a fact itself admitting no manner of question.' (pp. 162, 163.) Besides, as the same writer goes on to observe, there can be no doubt that the coming of the Son of God in the flesh, and the continual testimony of Jesus borne by the Church in her preaching and ordinances, have broken and kept down, in some measure, the grosser manifestations of the power of Satan. (See Luke x. 18.) But (6) the assumption contained in the objection above must not be thus unreservedly granted. We cannot tell in how many cases of insanity the malady may not even now be traced to direct demoniacal possession. And, finally, (7) the above view, which I am persuaded is the only one honestly consistent with any kind of belief in the truth of the Gospel narratives, will offend none, but those who deny the existence of the world of spirits altogether, and who are continually striving to narrow the limits of our belief in that which is invisible; a view which at every step involves difficulties far more serious than those from which it attempts to escape. But (II.) a fresh difficulty is here found in the latter part of the narrative, in which the devils enter into the swine, and their destruction follows. (1) Of the reason of this permission, we surely are not competent judges. Of this however we are sure, that 'if this granting of the request of the evil spirits helped in any way the cure of the man, caused them to resign their hold on him more easily, mitigated the paroxysm of their going forth (see Mark ix. 26), this would have been motive enough. Or still more probably, it may have been necessary, for the permanent healing of the man, that he should have an outward evidence and testimony that the hellish powers which held him in bondage had quitted him.' (Trench, p. 172.) (2) The destruction of the swine is not for a moment to be thought of in the matter, as if that were an act repugnant to the merciful character of our Lord's miracles. It finds its parallel in the cursing of the fig-tree (ch. xxi. 18—22); and we may well think that, if God has appointed so many animals daily to be slaughtered for the sustenance of men's bodies, He may also be pleased to destroy animal life when He sees fit for the liberation or instruction of their souls. Besides, if the confessedly far greater evil of the possession of men by evil spirits, and all the misery thereupon attendant, was permitted in God's inscrutable purposes, surely much more this lesser one. Whether there may have been special reasons in this case, such as the contempt of the Mosaic law by the keepers of the swine, we have no means of judging: but it is at least possible. (3) The fact itself related raises a question in our minds, which, though we cannot wholly answer, we may yet approximate to the solution of. How can we imagine the bestial nature capable of the reception of demoniac influence? If what has been cited above be true, and the unchecked indulgence of sensual appetite afforded an inlet for the powers of evil to possess the human demoniac, then we have their influence joined to that part of man's nature which he has in common with the brutes that perish, the animal and sensual soul (ψυχή). We may thus conceive that the same animal and sensual soul in the brute may be receptive of similar demoniacal influence.

But with this weighty difference: that whereas in man there is an individual, immortal spirit, to which alone belongs his personality and deliberative will and reason,—and there was ever in him, as we have seen, a struggle and a protest against this tyrant power; the oppressed soul, the real 'I,' calling out against the usurper—this would not be the case with the brute, in whom this personality and reflective consciousness is wanting. And the result in the text confirms our view; for as soon as the demons enter into the swine, their ferocity, having no self-conserving balance as in the case of man, impels them headlong to their own destruction.

[34.] This request, which is related by all three Evangelists, was probably not from humility, but for fear the miraculous powers of our Lord should work them still more worldly loss. For the additional particulars of this miracle, see Mark v. 15, 16, 18—20 : Luke viii. 35, and notes.

[IX. 1.] Certainly this verse should be the sequel of the history in the last chapter. It is not connected with the miracle following;—which is placed by St. Luke at a different time, but with the indefinite introduction of ἐγένετο ἐν μιᾷ τῶν ἡμερῶν. [τὸ] πλοῖον, not the ship, as applying to any particular ship previously used, or kept by our Lord and the disciples,—but simply generic,—and expressed idiomatically in English by a ship, as E. V. τὰ πλοῖα, 'ships,' are the whole genus, in which embarkation might have been made: τὸ πλοῖον, the individual of that genus, in which embarkation actually was made; but no further defined by the article, than as being one of that genus, not as being any one previously mentioned ship, or one hired for that purpose. This import of the article has been denied by Middleton, and the generic rendering in this commentary consequently impugned by his followers. In reply, I may observe (1) that of the occurrence of the generic sense, there is no doubt, even on Middleton's own shewing. In ch. x. 36, ἰχθῆοι τοῦ ἀνθρώπου, οἱ οὐκ ἀκούουσιν, he recognizes in substance the generic sense, by rendering τοῦ ἀνθρώπου 'every man,' or 'men generally,' though he calls the use 'hypothetic.' Compare also ἐξῆλθεν ὁ σκίπτων τοῦ σκίπτειν, ch. xiii. 3, where ὁ σκ. is merely in the singular what οἱ σκίπτοντες would be in the plural, viz. 'he that soweth,' 'a sower,' generic. See also ch. xv. 11 : Luke xi. 24; ch. xix. 10 : 1 Cor. vii. 3; ch. xxv. 32 (where in English also we might say, 'as the shepherd divideth the sheep from the goats'); also ch. x. 12, 27. (2) We may say, if we please, that some πλοῖον is implied in ἰμβὰς, and that the article refers to such implication. But this in fact amounts to the generic sense. If I say, without any previous mention of a particular ship, 'When he had embarked in the ship,' I imply by the word 'embarked,' connexion with a genus, ships: by adding, 'in the ship,' I signify elliptically, 'in the ship in which he did embark'; but I no further identify the ship, than as belonging to the genus before implied. (3) The use of the English article in the expressions, 'in the house' (= indoors), 'in the field,' &c. is a case in point: the articles here also being generic. τῇν ἰδ. πλά.] Capernaum, where our Lord now dwelt: cf. ch. iv. 13.

roof, because the whole house and space round the door was full, Mark ii. 4. εἰδὼν must be supposed to include the sick man, who was at least a consenting party to the bold step which they took. These words are common to the three Evangelists, as also ἀφένται σοι αἱ αμ. Neander (Leben Jesu, pp. 431, 432) has some excellent remarks on this man's disease. Either it was the natural consequence of sinful indulgence, or by its means the feeling of sinfulness and guilt was more strongly aroused in him, and he recognized the misery of his disease as the punishment of his sins. At all events spiritual and bodily pain seem to have been connected and interchanged within him, and the former to have received accession of strength from the presence of the latter. Schleiermacher (on St. Luke, p. 80) supposes the haste of these hearers to have originated in the prospect of our Lord's speedy departure thence; but, as Neander observes, we do not know enough of the paralytic's own state to be able to say whether there may not have been some cause for it in the man himself. ἀφένται.] Winer remarks (§ 14. 3).—The old grammarians themselves were divided about this word: some, as Eustathius, (Il. x. 590.) treat it as identical with ἀφένται, as in Homer ἀφίγ for ἀφῆ: others, more correctly, take it for the preterite (= ἀφένται), e. g. Herodian, the Etymologicon, and Suidas, with this difference however, that Suidas believes it to be a Doric, the author of the Etym. an Attic form; the former is certainly right, and this perfect-passive form is cognate with the perf.-act. ἀφίκα.

4. ἰδὼν] By the spiritual power indwelling in Him. See John ii. 24, 25. No other interpretation of such passages is admissible. St. Mark's expression, ἰπιννοῦς τῷ πνεύματι αὐτοῦ, is more precise and conclusive. So we have ἐνθεωμήσατο τῷ πνεύματι, John xi. 33, synonymous with ἐμβρομώμενος ἐν ἑαυτῷ, ibid. ver. 38.

5. τί γάρ ἔστιν ἐκεῖ.] "In our Lord's argument it must be carefully noted, that He does not ask, which is easiest, to forgive sins, or to raise a sick man—for it could not be affirmed that that of forgiving was easier than this of healing—but, which is easiest, to claim this power or that, to say Thy sins be forgiven thee, or to say, Arise and walk? That (i. e. the former) is easiest, and I will now prove my right to say it, by saying with effect and with an outward consequence setting its seal to my truth, the harder word, Arise and walk. very nature is incapable of being proved. From this, which I will now do openly and before you all, you may conclude that it is 'no robbery' (Phil. ii. 6, but see note there) upon my part to claim also the power of forgiving men their sins." Trench on the Miracles, p. 206.

6. δ υιου τ. ανθ.] The Messiah: an expression regarded by the Jews as equivalent to δ χριστος δ υιος του θεου, ch. xxvi. 63. See also John v. 27. "The Alexandrian Fathers, in their conflict with the Nestorians, made use of this passage in proof of the entire transference which there was of all the properties of Christ's divine nature to His human; so that whatever one had, was so far common, that it might also be predicated of the other. It is quite true that had not the two natures been indissolubly knit together in a single Person, no such language could have been used; yet I should rather suppose that 'Son of Man' being the standing title whereby the Lord was well pleased to designate Himself, bringing out by it that He was at once one with humanity, and the crown of humanity, He does not so use it that the title is every where to be pressed, but at times simply as equivalent to Messiah." Trench, p. 206.

εις της γης] Distinguished from εν τω σαρκει, as in ch. xvi. 19; xviii. 18. Bengel finely remarks, "Coelestem ortum hic sermo capit." The Son of Man, as God manifest in man's flesh, has on man's earth that power, which in its fountain and essence belongs to God in heaven.

And this not by delegation, but "because He (being God) is the Son of Man." John v. 27.

τοτε λεγει] See a similar interchange of the persons in construction, Gen. iii. 23, 23.

τοτε λεγει τω π. is not parenthetical, nor is ινα δε ελθete κ.τ.λ. an elliptic sentence; but the speech and narrative are intermixed. A simple construction would require either ινα δε ελθete . . . ωδε λεγει τω παρ. . . or ινα δε ειδωσιν . . . τοτε λεγει . . . We have, in the text, the first member of the former construction joined with the second of the latter.

8. τοις ανθρωποις] Not plur. for sing. 'to a man,' nor 'for the benefit of men;' but to mankind. They regarded this wonder-work as something by God granted to men—to mankind; and without supposing that they had before them the full meaning of their words, those words were true in the very highest sense. See John xvii. 8. In Mark they say, οτι οτως ουδισως εδωκεν: in Luke, οτι ειδωμεν παραδεξα σημερον.

9-17.] THE CALLING OF MATTHEW: THE FEAST CONSEQUENT ON IT: INQUIRY OF JOHN'S DISCIPLES RESPECTING FASTING:—AND OUR LORD'S ANSWER. Mark ii. 18-23: Luke v. 27-39. Our Lord was going out to the sea to teach, Mark, ver. 13. All three Evangelists connect this calling with the preceding miracle, and the subsequent entertainment. The real difficulty of the narrative is the question as to the identity of Matthew in the text, and Levi in Mark and Luke. I shall state the arguments on both sides. (1) There can be no question that the three narratives relate to the same event. They are identical almost verbatim; in:

parted between narratives indisputably relating the same occurrences. (2) The almost general consent of all ages has supposed the two persons the same. On the other hand, (3) our Gospel makes not the slightest allusion to the name of Levi, either here, or in ch. x. 3, where we find Μαθθαῖος ὁ τελώνης among the Apostles, clearly identified with the subject of this narrative: whereas the other two Evangelists, having in this narrative spoken of Levi, in their enumerations of the Apostles (Mark iii. 18: Luke vi. 15), mention Matthew without any note of identification with the Levi called on this occasion. This is almost inexplicable, on the supposition of his having borne both names. (4) Early tradition separates the two persons. Clement of Alexandria, (Stromata, iv. p. 595 P.), quoting from Heraclion the Gnostic, (ὁ τῆς Θεαλενριβου σχολῆς δοκῶντατος κατὰ λίβιν,) mentions Ματθαῖος, Φίλιππος, Θωμᾶς, Ἀνδρῆς καὶ ἄλλοι πολλοί, as eminent men who had not suffered martyrdom from a public confession of the faith. (5) Again, Origen, (against Celsus, book i. § 62, vol. i. p. 773, ed. Migne,) when Celsus has called the Apostles τελώνας καὶ ναύτας, after acknowledging Μαθθαῖος ὁ τελώνης ἄδελφός, ἰσχυρὸν δὲ καὶ ὁ Ἀνδρῆς τελώνης ἀκολουθήσας τῷ Ἰησοῦ. ἄλλ' οὐκ ἔστι γὰρ τοῦ ἀριθμοῦ τῶν ἀποστόλων αὐτοῦ ἦν, εἰ μὴ κατὰ τινὰ τῶν ἀντιγράφων τοῦ κατὰ Μάρκον εὐαγγελίου. It is not quite clear from this, whether the copies of Mark substituted Levi's (P) name for Matthew's, or for some other: but most probably the latter. But Ἀνδρῆς and Ἀνδρῆς are hardly more nearly allied than Ἀνδρῆς and Ἀνδρεῖος, with whom Levi has sometimes been supposed identical. Ἀνδρῆς τὸν τελώνην may then have been the reading for Θεοδῶτες, Mark iii. 18, where we now find the reading Ἀνδρεῖος in D lat-a δ ff. i. (6) It certainly would hence appear, as if there were in ancient times an idea that the two names belonged to distinct persons. But in the very passages where it is mentioned, a confusion is evident, which prevents us from drawing any certain conclusion able to withstand the general testimony to the contrary, arising from the prima facie view of the Gospel narrative. (7) It is probable enough that St. Matthew, in his own Gospel, would mention only his apostolic name, seeing that St. Mark and St. Luke also give him this name, when they speak of him as an Apostle. (8) It is remarkable, as an indication that St. Matthew's frequently unprecise manner of narration did not proceed from want of information,—that in this case, when he of all men must have been best informed, his own account is the least precise of the three. (9) With regard to the narrative itself in the text, we may observe, that this solemn and peculiar call seems (see ch. iv. 19, 22) hardly to belong to any but an Apostle; and that, as in the case of Peter, it here also implies a previous acquaintance and discipleship.

9.] λεγόμενον, not preceded by any other appellation, must not be pressed to any closer signification than that his name was Matthew. See ch. ii. 23. 10.] We are told in Luke v. 29, that Levi made him a great feast in his house; and, similarly, Mark has ἐν τῇ οἰκίᾳ αὐτοῦ. The narrative in our text is so closely identical with that in Mark, that it is impossible to suppose, with Greswell, that a different feast is intended. The arguments by which he supports his view are by no means weighty. From the words τῇ οἰκίᾳ, he infers that the house was not that of Matthew, but that in which our Lord usually dwelt, which he supposes to be intended in several other places. But surely the article might be used without any such significance, or designating any particular house,—as would be very likely if Matthew himself is here the narrator. (A similar mistake has been made in supposing τὸ πλοῖον, as in ver. 1, and elsewhere, to mean some one particular ship; whereas it is generic; see note there.) Again, Greswell presses to verbal accuracy the terms used in the accounts (e. g. συναπεικνυτο and ἐλθόντες συνανέκριντο), and attempts to shew them to be inconsistent with one another. But surely the time is past for such dealing with the historic text of the Gospels; and, besides, he has overlooked a great inconsistency in his own explanation, viz., that of making in the second instance, according to him, Scribes and Pharisees present at the feast given by a Publican, and exclaiming against that which they themselves were doing. It was not at, but after the feast that the discourse in vv. 11—17 took place. And his whole inference, that δοχή μεγάλη must be the great meal in the day, and consequently in the evening, hangs on too slender a thread to need refutation. The real difficulty, insuperable to a Harmonist, is the connexion here of the raising of Jai-¹rus's daughter with this feast: on which see below, ver. 18. ¹καὶ ὅγν. . . .

καὶ 18.] a Hebraism, see ref.; it occurs, but with the omission of ἰδοὺ, in Mark's account. The not very usual word, συνανέκριντο, is also common to the two. St. Mark, with his usual precision, adds ἦσαν γὰρ πολλοὶ καὶ ἡκολούθησαν αὐτῷ: a clause answering to ἐλθόντες in our text. See last note. ¹¹ ἰδόντες] having observed this, see ver. 4. These Pharisees appear to have been the Pharisees of the place: Luke adds αὐτῶν: οἱ Φ. καὶ οἱ γραμ. αὐτῶν. The very circumstances related shew that this remonstrance cannot have taken place at the feast. The Pharisees say the words to the disciples: our Lord hears it. This denotes an occasion when our Lord and the disciples were present, but not surely intermixed with the ἑχλος τελωνῶν παλός.

¹² ἰσχύοντες . . . κακῶς ἔχ. Both words, in the application of the saying, must be understood subjectively ('ironica concessio,' Calvin, Meyer): as referring to their respective opinions of themselves; as also δικαίους and ἁμαρτωλοὺς, ver. 13:—not as though the Pharisees were objectively either ἰσχύοντες or δικαιοί, however much objective truth κακῶς ἔχοντες and ἁμαρτωλοὶ may have had as applied to the publicans and sinners. ¹³] πορευθέντες μάθεις answers to an expression frequent in the Talmud, ¹נלך מר.

¹⁴ The whole of this discourse, with the exception of the citation, is almost verbatim in Mark, and (with ὑγιαίνοντες = ἰσχύοντες, ἐλήλυθα = ἦλθον, and the addition of εἰς μετάνειαν) Luke also.

¹⁴] According to the detailed narrative of St. Mark (ii. 18) it was the disciples of John and of the Pharisees who asked this question. St. Luke continues the discourse as that of the former Pharisees and Scribes. This is one of those instances where the three accounts imply and confirm one another, and the hints incidentally dropped by one Evangelist form the prominent assertions of the other.

The fasting often of the disciples of John must not be understood as done in mourning for their master's imprisonment, but as belonging to the asceticism which John, as a preacher of repentance, inculcated. On the fasts of the Pharisees, see Light-foot in loc.

15. πενθεῖν = νηστεύειν Mark and Luke. The difference of these two words is curiously enough one of Gresswell's arguments for the non-identity of the narratives. Even if there were any force in such an argument, we might fairly set against it that ἀπαρθῇ is common to all three Evangelists, and occurs no where else in the N. T. ὁ νυμφίος]

This appellation of Himself had from our Lord peculiar appropriateness as addressed to the disciples of John. Their master had himself said (John iii. 29) ὁ ἔχων τὴν νύμφην, νυμφίος ἐστίν· ὁ δὲ φίλος τοῦ νυμφίου ὁ ἰστηνός καὶ ἀκούων αὐτοῦ, χαρὰ χαίρει διὰ τὴν φωνὴν τοῦ νυμφίου. αὐτῇ οὖν ἡ χαρὰ ἡ ἐμὴ πεπλήρωται.

Our Lord in calling Himself the Bridegroom, announces the fulfilment in Him of a whole cycle of O. T. prophecies and figures: very probably with immediate reference to Hosea ii., that prophet having been cited just before: but also to many other passages, in which the Bride is the Church of God, the Bridegroom the God of Israel. See especially Isa. liv. 5—10 Heb. and E. V. As Stier (Reden Jesu, i. 320, edn. 2) observes, the article here must not be considered as merely introduced on account of the parable, as usual elsewhere, but the parable itself to have sprung out of the emphatic name, ὁ νυμφίος. The υἱοὶ τοῦ νυμφῶνος are more than the mere guests at the wedding: they are the bridegroom's friends who go and fetch the bride. ἐλεύσονται δὲ ἔμ.] How sublime and peaceful is this early announcement by our Lord of the bitter passage before Him!

Compare the words of our Christian poet: 'measuring with calm presage the infinite descent.' (Ezigenmann mag dabei wohl fragen: 'Selbster Botschaft hat je so ruhig, so lieblich von einer solchen Höhe in eine solche Tiefe geschaut?' Stier, Reden Jesu, i. 322.)

ὅταν ἀπ.] when the Bridegroom shall have been taken from them: when His departure shall have taken place.

καὶ τότε v.] These words are not a declaration of a duty, or of an ordinance, as binding on the Church in the days of her Lord's absence: the whole spirit of what follows is against such a supposition: but they declare, in accordance with the parallel word πενθεῖν, that in those days they shall have real occasion for fasting; sorrow enough; see John xvi. 20:—a fast of God's own appointing in the solemn purpose of His will respecting them, not one of their own arbitrary laying on. This view is strikingly brought out in Luke, where the question is, Can ye κοῖνῶσαι νηστεύειν the children, &c., i. e. by your rites and ordinances? but, &c. and τότε νηστεύουσιν: there is no constraint in this latter case: they shall (or better, they will) fast. And this furnishes us with an analogous rule for the fasting of the Christian life: that it should be the genuine offspring of inward and spiritual sorrow, of the sense of the absence of the Bridegroom in the soul,—not the forced and stated fasts of the old covenant, now passed away. It is an instructive circumstance that in the Reformed Churches, while those stated fasts which were retained at their first emergence from Popery are in practice universally dis- regarded even by their best and holiest sons,—nothing can be more affecting and genuine than the universal and solemn ob- servance of any real occasion of fasting placed before them by God's Providence. It is also remarkable how uniformly a strict attention to artificial and prescribed fasts accompanies a hankering after the hybrid ceremonial system of Rome. Meyer remarks well that τέτε refers to a definite point of time, not to the whole subse- quent period. 16.] Our Lord in these two parables contrasts the old and the new, the legal and evangelic dispensa- tions, with regard to the point on which He was questioned. The idea of the wed- ding seems to run through them: the preparation of the robe, the pouring of the new wine, are connected by this as their leading idea to one another and to the preceding verses. The old system of prescribed fasts for fasting's sake must not be patched with the new and sound piece; the complete and beautiful whole of Gos- pel light and liberty must not be en- grafted as a mere addition on the worn out system of ceremonies. For the πλή- ρωμα αὐτοῦ, the completeness of it, the new patch, by its weight and its strength pulls away the neighbouring weak and loose threads by which it holds to the old garment, and a worse rent is made. Stier notices the prophetic import of this pa- rable: in how sad a degree the χεῖρον σχίσμα γίνεται has been fulfilled in the History of the Church, by the attempts to patch the new, the Evangelic state, upon the old worn out ceremonial system. 'Would,' he adds, 'that we could say in the interpretation, as in the parable, No man doeth this!' The robe must be all new, all consistent: old things, old types, old ceremonies, old burdens, sacrifices, priests, sabbaths, and holy days, all are passed away: behold all things are be- come new. χεῖρον σκ. γίν.] a worse rent takes place: not, as E. V., 'the rent becomes worse' (χ. γίν. τὸ σκ.,—or χ. τὸ σκ. γίν.), a worse rent, because the old, original rent was included within the cir- cumference of the ἐπιβλημα, whereas this is outside it. 17.] This parable is not a repetition of the previous one, but a stronger and more exact setting forth of the truth in hand. As is frequently our Lord's practice in His parables, He ad- vances from the immediate subject to something more spiritual and higher, and takes occasion from answering a cavil, to preach the sublimest truths. The gar- ment was something outward; this wine is poured in, is something inward, the spirit of the system. The former parable respected the outward freedom and simple truthfulness of the New Covenant; this regards its inner spirit, its pervading prin- ciple. And admirably does the parable describe the vanity of the attempt to keep the new wine in the ἀσκός παλαιός, the old ceremonial man, unrenewed in the spirit of his mind: ῥήγνυνται οἱ ἀσκοί: the new wine is something too living and strong for so weak a moral frame; it shatters the fair outside of ceremonial seeming; and ὁ οἶνος ἐκχῆται, the spirit is lost, the man is neither a blameless Jew nor a faithful Christian; both are spoiled. And then the result: not merely the damaging, but the utter destruction of the vessel,—οἱ ἄσκοι ἀπολούνται. According to some expositors, the new patch and new wine denote the fasting; the old garment and old bottles, the disciples. ὁ δὲ λίγει, τοιοῦτόν ἐστιν οὕτω γεγόνασιν ἰσχυροὶ οἱ μαθηταί, ἀλλ' ἐν πολλῇς δυνάμει συγκαταβάτως οὕτω διὰ τοῦ πνεύματος ἀνεκαινίσθησαν. οὕτω δὲ διακειμένοις οὐ χρὴ βάρος ἐπιτιθεῖναι ἐπιταγμάτων. Chrysostom, Hom. in Matt. xxx. p. 358. This view is stated and defended at some length by Neander, Leben Jesu, p. 346, note; but I own seems to me, as to De Wette, far-fetched. For how can fasting be called ἐπιβλημα ῥάκους ἀγνῆτου, or how compared to new wine? And Neander himself, when he comes to explain the important addition in Luke (on which see Luke v. 39, and note), is obliged to change the meaning, and understand the new wine of the spirit of the Gospel. It was and is the custom in the East to carry their wine on a journey in leather bottles, generally of goats' skin, sometimes of asses' or camels' skin. (Winer, Realwörterbuch, 'Schlauch.')

18—26.] RAISING OF JARIRUS'S DAUGHTER, AND HEALING OF A WOMAN WITH AN ISSUE OF BLOOD. Mark v. 21—48: Luke viii. 41—56. In Luke and

Mark this miracle follows immediately after the casting out of the devils at Gadara, and our Lord's recrossing the lake to Capernaum; but without any precise note of time as here. He may well have been by the sea (as seems implied by Mark and Luke), when the foregoing conversation with the disciples of John and the Pharisees took place. The account in the text is the most concise of the three; both Mark and Luke, but especially the latter, giving many additional particulars. The miracle forms a very instructive point of comparison between the three Gospels.

18. ἔρχων εἰς] A ruler of the synagogue, named Jairus. In all except the connecting words, ταῦτα αὐτοῦ λαλοῦντος αὐτοῖς, and εἰσελθ., which seems to imply that our Lord was still in Levi's house, the account in the text is summary, and deficient in particularity. I have therefore reserved full annotation for the account in Luke, which see throughout.

ἄρτι ἐτελεύτησεν] She was not dead, but dying: at the last extremity. St. Matthew, omitting the message from the ruler's house (Mark v. 35: Luke viii. 49), gives the matter summarily in these words.

20.] The κρόσσον, see ref. Num., was the fringe or tassel which the Jews were commanded to wear on each corner of their outer garment, as a sign that they were to be holy unto God. The article, as in ch. xiv. 36, designates the particular tassel which was touched.

use the expression, the house, as opposed to the open air: see note on ver. 1. τοῦτο ποιῆσαι] i. e. the healing, implied in ἡλίσσον ἡμᾶς. υἱὸς Δ. . . . κύριε] See Ps. cx. 1, and ch. xxii. 45; also ch. xii. 23; xx. 30, 31. Touching, or anointing the eyes, was the ordinary method which our Lord took of impressing on the blind the action of the divine power which healed them. Ch. xx. 34: Mark viii. 25: John ix. 6. 29.] In this miracle however we have this peculiar feature, that no direct word of power passes from our Lord, but a relative concession, making that which was done a measure of the faith of the blind men: and from the result the degree of their faith appears. Stier remarks (Beden Jesu, i. 883), "We may already notice, in the history of this first period of our Lord's ministry, that, from having at first yielded immediately to the request for healing, He begins, by degrees, to prove and exercise the faith of the applicants." 30. ἠνεβριμήθη] Suidas explains this word, μετὰ ἀπειλῆς ἐντίλλεσθαι, μετ' αὐστηρότητος ἐπειμῆναι. The purpose of our Lord's earnestness appears to have been twofold: (1) that He might not be so occupied and overpressed with applications as to have neither time nor strength for the preaching of the Gospel: (2) to prevent the already-excited people from taking some public measure of recognition, and thus arousing the malice of the Pharisees before His hour was come.

No doubt the two men were guilty of an act of disobedience in thus breaking the Lord's solemn injunction: for obedience is better than sacrifice; the humble observance of the word of the Lord, than the most laborious and wide-spread will-worship after man's own mind and invention. Trench (Miracles, p. 197) well remarks, that the fact of almost all the Romish interpreters having applauded this act, "is very characteristic, and rests on very deep differences."

32—34.] HEALING OF A DUMB DEMONIAK. Peculiar to Matthew. The word ἐξερχομένων, being a present participle, places this miracle in direct connexion with the foregoing. This narration has a singular affinity with that in ch. xii. 22, or still more with its parallel in Luke xi. 14. In both, the same expression of wonder follows; the same calamity of the Pharisees; only that in ch. xii. the demoniac is said (not in Luke xi.) to have been likewise blind. These circumstances, coupled with the immediate connexion of this miracle with the cure of the blind men, and the mention of 'the Son of David' in both, have led some to suppose that the account in ch. xii. is a repetition, or slightly differing version of the account in our text, intermingled also with the preceding healing of the blind. But the supposition seems unnecessary,—as, the habit of the Pharisees once being to ascribe our Lord's expulsion of devils to Beelzebub, the repetition of the remark would be natural:—and the other coincidences, though considerable, are not exact enough to warrant it. This was a dumbness caused by demoniacal possession: for the difference between this and

THE MULTITUDE. Peculiar to Matthew.
In the same way as ch. iv. 23—25 introduces the Sermon on the Mount, so do these verses the calling and commissioning of the Twelve. These general descriptions of our Lord's going about and teaching at once remove all exactness of date from the occurrence which follows—as taking place at some time during the circuit and teaching just described. Both the Sermon on the Mount and this discourse are introduced and closed with these marks of indefiniteness as to time.
This being the case, we must have recourse to the other Evangelists, by whose account it appears (as indeed may be implied in ch. x. 1), that the Apostles had been called to their distinct office some

From this it appears (1), that in all four three classes are enumerated, and that each class contains (assuming at present the identity of Λεββαῖος with Θαδδαῖος, and of Θαδδαῖος with Ἰούδας Ἰσκαρίου) order of calling and connexion, and with reference to their being sent out in couples, Mark vi. 7: (β) Mark and Luke (Acts),—Peter, James, John, (the three principal,) and Andrew;—i. e. according to their personal pre-eminence. In the second class (γ), that of Matt., Mark, and Luke (Gospel),—Philip and Bartholomew, Matthew and Thomas,—i. e. in couples: (δ) Luke (Acts),—Philip, Thomas, Barth., Matthew (reason uncertain). In the third class (ε), Matt. and Mark,—James the (son?) of Alphaeus and (Lebb.) Thaddaeus, Simon the Cananaean and Judas Iscariot; i. e. in couples: (ζ) Luke (Gosp. and Acts) James the (son?) of Alphaeus, Simon Zelotes, Judas Ἰακώβου and Judas Iscariot (uncertain). (η) Thus in all four, the leaders of the three classes are the same, viz. Peter, Philip, and James the (son?) of Alphaeus; and the traitor is always last. (θ) It would appear then that the only difficulties are these two: the identity of Lebbeus with Thaddaeus, and with Judas Ἰακώβου, and of Simon καναναῖος with Simon ὁ καλ. ζηλωτής. These will be discussed under the names.

πρῶτος] Not only as regards arrangement, or mere priority of calling, but as primus inter pares. This is clearly shewn from James and John and Andrew being set next, and Judas Iscariot the last, in all the catalogues. We find Simon Peter, not only in the lists of the Apostles, but also in their history, prominent on various occasions before the rest. Sometimes he speaks in their name (Matt. xix. 27: Luke xii. 41); sometimes answers when all are addressed (Matt. xvi. 16 ||); sometimes our Lord addresses him as principal, even among the three favoured ones (Matt. xxvi. 40: Luke xxii. 31); sometimes he is addressed by others as representing the whole (Matt. xvii. 24: Acts ii. 37). He appears as the organ of the Apostles after our Lord's ascension (Acts i. 15; ii. 14; iv. 8; v. 29): the first speech, and apparently that which decided the Council, is spoken by him, Acts xv. 7. All this accords well with the bold and energetic character of Peter, and originated in the unerring discernment and appointment of our Lord Himself, who saw in him a person adapted to take precedence of the rest in the founding of His Church, and shutting (Acts v. 3, 9) and opening (Acts ii. 14, 41; x. 6, 46) the doors of the kingdom of Heaven. That however no such idea was current among the Apostles as that he was destined to be the Primate of the future Church, is as clear as the facts above mentioned. For (1) no trace of such a pre-eminence is found in all the Epistles of the other Apostles; but when he is mentioned, it is either, as 1 Cor. ix. 5, as one of the Apostles, one example among many, but in no wise the chief;—or as in Gal. ii. 7, 8, with a distinct account of a peculiar province of duty and preaching being allotted to him, viz. the apostleship of the circumcision, (see 1 Pet. i. 1,) as distinguished from Paul, to whom was given the apostleship of the uncircumcision:—or as in Gal. ii. 9, as one of the principal σὺλοι, together with James and John;—or as in Gal. ii. 11, as subject to rebuke from Paul as from an equal. And (2) wherever by our Lord Himself the future constitution of His Church is alluded to, or by the Apostles its actual constitution, no hint of any such primacy is given, (see note on Matt. xvi. 18,) but the whole college of Apostles are spoken of as absolutely equal. Matt. xix. 27, 28; ix. 26, 28: Eph. ii. 20, and many other places. Again (3) in the two Epistles which we have from his own hand, there is nothing for, but every thing against, such a supposition. He exhorts the πρεσβύτεροι as being their συμπρεσβύτερος (1 Pet. v. 1): describes himself as τῆς μελλούσης ἀποκαλύπτεσθαι δόξης κοινωνός: addresses his second Epistle τοῖς ἰσότημον ἡμῖν λαχοῦσιν κτλ (2 Pet. i. 1): and makes not the slightest allusion to any pre-eminence over the other Apostles. So that πρῶτος here must be understood as signifying the prominence of Peter among the Apostles, as well as his early calling. (See John i. 42.)

ὁ λεγόμενος Πέτρος] Or Κηρᾶς, κηρᾶ, so named by our Lord Himself (John as above) at His first meeting with him, and again more solemnly, and with a direct reference to the meaning of the name, Matt. xvi. 18. Ἀνδρέας] He, in conjunction with John (see note on John i. 37—41), was a disciple of the Baptist, and both of them followed our Lord, on their Master pointing Him out as the Lamb of God. They did not however from that time constantly accompany Him, but received a more solemn calling (see Matt. iv. 17—22: Luke v. 1—11)— in the narrative of which Peter is prominent, and so πρῶτος called as an Apostle, at least of those four.

1. ¹Ιάκ. ὁ τ. Z. κ. ¹Ιωάν.] Partners in the fishing trade with Peter and Andrew, Luke v. 10.

3. Φίλ. κ. Βαρθ. Φ.] Philip was called by our Lord the second day after the visit of Andrew and John, and the day after the naming of Peter. He was also of Bethsaida, the city of Andrew and Peter, James and John.

Ἀνδρίας and Φίλιππος are Greek names. See John xii. 20—22. Βαρθολομαῖος ὥς υἱοῦ υἱ, son of Talmi or Tolomæus, has been generally supposed to be the same with Nathanael of Cana in Galilee; and with reason: for (1) the name Bartholomew is not his own name, but a patronymic:—(2) He follows next in order, as Nathanael, in John i. 46, to the Apostles just mentioned, with the same formula which had just been used of Philip's own call (ver. 44),—εὐρίσκει Φίλιππος τὸν Ναθ.:—(3) He is there, as here, and in Mark and Luke (Gospel), in connexion with Philip (that he was his brother, was conjectured by Dr. Donaldson; but rendered improbable by the fact that John in the case of Andrew a few verses above, expressly says εὐρίσκει τὸν ἀδελφὸν τὸν ἴδιον Σίμωνα, whereas in ver. 46 no such specification is found):—(4) In John xxi. 2, at the appearance of our Lord on the shore of the sea of Tiberias, Nathanael is mentioned as present, where seven apostles (μαθηταί) are recounted.

Θωμᾶς κ. Μαθθ. ὁ τελ.] Thomas (τῶς), in Greek Δίδυμος, John xi. 16; xx. 24; xxi. 2. Μαθθ. ὁ τελ. is clearly by this appellation identified with the Matthew of ch. ix. 9. We hear nothing of him, except in these two passages. Dr. Donaldson (Jasher. p. 10 f.) believed Matthew and Thomas to have been twin brothers. Eus., H. E. i. 13, preserves a tradition that Thomas's real name was Judas: Θωμᾶς, ὁ καὶ Ἰούδας.

1. ¹Ιάκ. ὁ τ. Ἀλφαίου] From John xix. 25, some infer (but see note there), that Mary the (wife) of Κλωπᾶς was sister of Mary the mother of our Lord. From Mark xv. 40, that Mary was the mother of James τοῦ μικροῦ, which may be this James. Hence it would appear, if these two passages point to the same person, that Ἀλφαῖος = Κλωπᾶς. And indeed the two Greek names are but different ways of expressing the Hebrew name Ἰάκωβ. If this be so, then this James the Less may possibly be the ὁ ἀδελφὸς τοῦ κυρίου mentioned Gal. i. 19 apparently as an apostle, and one of the ἀδελφοὶ αὐτοῦ mentioned Matt. xiii. 55 (where see note) (?). But on the difficulties attending this view, see note on John vii. 5. Λεββαῖος] Much difficulty rests on this name, both from the various readings, and the questions arising from the other lists. The rec. reading appears to be a conjunction of the two ancient ones, Λεββαῖος and Θαδδαῖος: the latter of these having been introduced from Mark. (But it is noticeable, that in Mark D has Λεββαῖος.) Whichever of these is the true reading, the Apostle himself has generally been supposed to be identical with Ἰούδας Ἰακώβου in both Luke's catalogues, i. e. (see note there) Judas the brother (Dr. Donaldson supposed son: see note on Luke xxiv. 13) of James, and so son of Alphæus, and commonly supposed to be (?) one of the ἀδελφοὶ κυρίου named Matt. xiii. 55. In John xiv. 22 we have a 'Judas, not Iscariot,' among the Apostles: and the catholic epistle is written by a 'Judas brother of James.' What in this case the names Λεββαῖος and Θαδδαῖος are, is impossible to say. The common idea that they are cognate names, Λεβ. being from לב, heart, and Θαδ. from חב, breast, is disproved by De Wette, who observes that the latter signifies mammas, and not pectus. So that the whole rests on conjecture, which however does not contradict any known fact, and may be allowed as the only escape from the difficulty.

(Hebr. יִשְׁכָּרִי = ζηλωτής (Luke, Gosp. and Acts). We may therefore suppose that before his conversion he belonged to the sect of the Zealots, who after the example of Phinehas (Num. xxv. 7, 8) took justice into their own hands, and punished offenders against the law. This sect eventually brought upon Jerusalem its destruction.

Ἰούδας ὁ ἰσκ. Son of Simon (John vi. 71; [xii. 4 v. r.] xiii. 2, 26). Probably a native of Kerieth in Judea, Josh. xv. 25, כִּרְיָת שֹׁמֶר, a man of Kerieth, as ισκαριωθ, i. e. יִשְׁכָּרִי, a man of Tob, Joseph. Antt. vii. 6. 1. That the name ισκ. cannot be a surname, as Bp. Middleton supposes, the expression Ἰούδας Σίμωνος ἰσκαριώτης, used in all the above places of John, clearly proves. Dr. Donaldson assumed it as certain that the Simon last mentioned was the father of Judas Iscariot. But surely this is very uncertain, in the case of so common a name as Simon.

5. λέγων If we compare this verse with ch. xi. 1, there can be little doubt that this discourse of our Lord was delivered at one time, and that, the first sending of the Twelve. How often its solemn injunctions may have been repeated on similar occasions we cannot say: many of them reappear at the sending of the Seventy in Luke x. 2 ff. Its primary reference is to the then mission of the Apostles to prepare His way; but it includes, in the germ, instructions prophetically delivered for the ministers and missionaries of the Gospel to the end of time. It may be divided into THREE GREAT PORTIONS, in each of which different departments of the subject are treated, but which follow in natural sequence on one another. In the FIRST of these (vv. 5—15), our Lord, taking up the position of the messengers whom He sends from the declaration with which the Baptist and He Himself began their ministry, οὗτις ἡγγικεν ἡ βασιλεία τῶν οὐρανῶν, gives them commands, mostly literal and of present import, for their mission to the cities of Israel. This portion concludes with a denunciation of judgment against that unbelief which should reject their preaching. The SECOND (vv. 16—23) refers to the general mission of the Apostles as developing itself, after the Lord should be taken from them, in preaching to Jews and Gentiles (vv. 17, 18), and subjecting them to persecutions (vv. 21, 22). This portion ends with the end of the apostolic period properly so called, ver. 23 referring primarily to the destruction of Jerusalem. In this portion there is a foreshadowing of what shall be the lot and duty of the teachers of the Gospel to the end, inasmuch as the 'coming of the Son of Man' is ever typical of His final coming to judgment. Still the direct reference is to the Apostles and their mission, and the other only by inference. The THIRD (vv. 24—42), the longest and weightiest portion, is spoken directly (with occasional reference only to the Apostles and their mission [ver. 40]) of all disciples of the Lord,—their position,—their encouragements,—their duties,—and finally concludes with the last great reward (ver. 42).

In these first verses, 5, 6,—we have the location; in 7, 8, the purpose; in 9, 10, the fitting out; and in 11—14, the manner of proceeding,—of their mission: ver. 15 concluding with a prophetic denouncement, tending to impress them with a deep sense of the importance of the office entrusted to them. Σαμαρειτῶν] The Samaritans were the Gentile inhabitants of the country between Judaea and Galilee, consisting of heathens whom Shalmaneser king of Assyria brought from Babylon and other places. Their religion was a mixture of the worship of the true God with idolatry (2 Kings xvii. 24—41). The Jews had no dealings with them, John iv. 9. They appear to have been not so unready as the Jews to receive our Lord and His mission (John iv. 39—42: Luke ix. 51 ff., Lord's commands in this passage. But we must not therefore imagine that they are not bound by the spirit of them. This literal first mission was but a fore-shadowing of the spiritual subsequent sending out of the ministry over the world, which ought therefore in spirit every where to be conformed to these rules.

11. ἄξιός] Inclined to receive you and your message,—worthy that you should become his guest: so ἁγίος is used with reference to the matter treated of in the context, see reff. Such persons in this case would be of the same kind as those spoken of Acts xiii. 48 as εὐαγγελιστοὶ εἰς ζωὴν αἰώνιον. The precept in this verse is very much more fully set forth by Luke, x. 7 ff. ἔως ἂν ἐξέλθῃτε] Until ye depart out of the city.

The full command as to their conduct, from arriving to departing, is given in ver. 11. Then, the subject being taken up again at their arrival in the city, the method of ἰεῖρασις is prescribed to them in vv. 12, 13. When they enter into an house, (so, idiomatically, E. V.,) they are to salute it: and if on enquiry it prove worthy, then &c. See notes on ch. ix. 1, 28. 13. ἢ εἰρήνη ἔστω] The peace mentioned in the customary Eastern salutation ἡ εἰρήνη (x. 5). Compare with the spirit of vv. 10—13,—ch.

vii. 6. Stier remarks (Reden Jesu, i. p. 355, ed. 2), that the spirit of these commands binds Christian ministers to all accustomed courtesies of manner in the countries and ages in which their mission may lie. So we find the Greek χαίρειν instead of the Jewish form of greeting, Acts xv. 23: James i. 1. And the same spirit forbids that repelling official pride by which so many ministers lose the affections of their people. And this is to be without any respect to the worthiness or otherwise of the inhabitants of the house. In the case of unworthiness, 'let your peace return (see Isa. xlv. 23) to you,' i. e. 'be as though you had never spoken it,' μηδὲν ἐνεργήσατω, ἀλλὰ ταύτην μὲθ' ἑαυτῶν λαβόντες ἐξέλθετε. Euthym. 14.] See Acts xiii. 51; xviii. 6. A solemn act which might have two meanings: (1) as Luke x. 11 expresses at more length,—'We take nothing of yours with us, we free ourselves from all contact and communion with you;' or (2),—which sense probably lies beneath both this and ver. 13, 'We free ourselves from all participation in your condemnation: will have nothing in common with those who have rejected God's message.' See 1 Kings ii. 5, where the shoes on the feet are mentioned as partakers in the guilt of blood. It was a custom of the Pharisees, when they entered Judæa from a Gentile land, to do this act, as renouncing all communion with Gentiles: those then who would not receive the apostolic message were to be treated as no longer Israelites, but Gentiles. Thus the verse

Eccl. v. 16, quoting a book against the Montanists, οὐδὲ μὴν οὐδὲ ἐν συναγωγαῖς Ἰουδαίων τῶν γυναικῶν τις ἱμαστιγώθη ποτὶ, ἢ ἐλθοβολήθη· οὐδαμῶς οὐδαμῶς. The scourging in the synagogues is supposed to have been inflicted by order of the Tribunal of Three, who judged in them. 18.] καὶ . . . & implies, yea and moreover; assuming what has just been said and passing on to something more. The words are always separated, except in the Epic poets. See Viger, ed. Herm. p. 545 (note), 844: Hartung, Partikellehre, i. 181 f.: Klotz ad Devar. p. 645. ἡγεμόνες—Proconsuls, Proβασιλεῖς, as (Herod,) Agrippa. The former verse was of Jewish persecution; this, of Gentile: the concluding words shew that the scope of both, in the divine purposes, as regarded the Apostles, was the same, viz. εἰς μαρτ. αὐτ. κ. τ. ἔθν. The μαρτ. is in both senses—a testimony to, and against them (see ch. viii. 4, note), and refers to both sets of persecutors: αὐτοῖς, to them, i. e. the Jews (not the ἡγ. καὶ βασ., for they are in most cases Gentiles themselves), καὶ τοῖς ἔθν. It was a testimony in the best sense to Sergius Paulus, Acts xiii. 7, but against Felix, Acts xxiv. 25; and this double power ever belongs to the word of God as preached—it is a διαστροφὴς ῥήματα (Rev.

i. 16; ii. 12).

19.] μὴ μεριμνήσητε —take not anxious (or distracting) thought. A spiritual prohibition, answering to the literal one in ven. 9, 10. See Exodus iv. 12.

20. οὐ γὰρ ἡμ. κ. τ. λ.] This shews the reference of the command to a future mission of the Apostles, see John xv. 26, 27. (1) It is to be observed that our Lord never in speaking to His disciples says our Father, but either my Father (ch. xviii. 10), or your Father (as here), or both conjoined (John xx. 17); never leaving it to be inferred that God is in the same sense His Father and our Father. (2) It is also to be observed that in the great work of God in the world, human individuality sinks down and vanishes, and God alone, His Christ, His Spirit, is the great worker, as here οὐχ ὑμεῖς ἐστε . . . ἀλλὰ τὸ πν. τοῦ π. ἡμ.

21.] Spoken perhaps of official in-formation given against Christians, as there are no female relations mentioned. But the general idea is also included.

22. πάντων] i. e. all else but yourselves; not, as De Wette so often interprets, 'a strong expression, intended to signify many, or the majority of mankind.'

ὁ δὲ ἔσθω.] In order to understand these words it is necessary to enter into the character of our Lord's prophecies respecting His coming, as having an immediate literal, and a distant foreshadowed fulfilment. Throughout this discourse and the great prophecy in ch. xxiv., we find the first apostolic period used as have no worse. The threefold relation of our Lord and His followers here brought out may thus be exemplified from Scripture: μαθητής and διδάσκαλος, Matt. v. 1; xxiii. 8; Luke vi. 20; δούλος and ἐπίοιος, John xiii. 13; Luke xii. 35—48; Rom. i. 1; 2 Pet. i. 1; Jude 1; οἰκοδεσπότης and οἰκιακοί, Matt. xxvi. 28—29 ||: Luke xxiv. 30; Matt. xxiv. 45 ff. ||.

Talm. p. 333), from $\tau\eta\tau$ and $\tau\eta\tau$, a house, by which it would exactly correspond to οἰκοδεσπότης)—A name by which the prince of the devils was called by the Jews, ch. xii. 24,—to which accusation, probably an usual one (see ch. ix. 34), and that in John viii. 48, our Lord probably refers. In those places they had not literally called Him Beelzebub, but He speaks of their mind and intention in those charges. They may however have literally done so on other unrecorded occasions.

²⁶ μὴ οὖν] The force of this is: 'Notwithstanding their treatment of Me your Master, Mine will be victory and triumph; therefore ye, My disciples, in your turn, need not fear.' Compare Rom. viii. 37. οὐδὲν γάρ ἐστιν] This solemn truth is again and again enounced by our Lord on different occasions, and with different references. See Luke viii. 17; xii. 2. The former part of the verse drew comfort and encouragement from the past: this from the future. 'All that is hidden must be revealed'—(1) it is God's purpose in His Kingdom that the everlasting Gospel shall be freely preached, and this purpose ye serve. (2) Beware then of hypocrisy (see Luke xii. 2) through fear of men, for all such will be detected and exposed hereafter: and (3) fear them not, for, under whatever aspersions ye may labour from them, the day is coming which shall clear you and condemn them, if ye are fearlessly doing the work of Him that sent you' (ch. xiii. 43). $\tau\eta\ \tau\eta\tau$ ὧς ἐκεῖν ἀγγεῖται; ὅτι γόντας ὑμᾶς καλοῦσι καὶ πλάνους; ἀναμίναιτε μικρόν, καὶ σωτήρας ὑμᾶς καὶ ἐνεργίας τῆς οἰκουμένης προσεποῦσιν ἅπαντες. Chrys. Hom. xxxiv. p. 390.

²⁷] An expansion of the duty of freeness and boldness of speech implied in the last verse. The words may bear two meanings: either (1) that which Chrysostom gives, taking the expressions relatively, $\epsilon\pi\iota\theta\eta\ \mu\acute{o}\nu\omicron\iota\varsigma\ \alpha\iota\tau\omicron\iota\varsigma\ \delta\iota\epsilon\lambda\acute{\iota}\gamma\tau\omicron\varsigma\ \kappa\alpha\iota\ \epsilon\iota\ \mu\iota\kappa\rho\acute{\alpha}\ \gamma\omega\eta\iota\alpha\ \tau\eta\varsigma\ \Pi\alpha\lambda\alpha\iota\sigma\tau\iota\eta\varsigma$, διὰ τοῦτο εἰπὼν "ἐν τῇ σκοτίᾳ," καὶ "εἰς τὸ οὐς," πρὸς τὴν μετὰ ταῦτα παρρησίαν ἱσομένην, Hom. xxxiv. p. 390; or (2) as this part of the discourse relates to the future principally, the secret speaking may mean the communication which our Lord would hold with them hereafter by His Spirit, which they were to preach and proclaim. See Acts iv. 20. These senses do not exclude one another, and are possibly both implied. There is no need, with Lightfoot and others, to suppose any allusion to a custom in the synagogue, in the words εἰς τὸ οὐς ἀκούετε. They are a common expression derived from common life: we have it in a wider sense Acts xi. 22, and Gen. 1. 4. ἐπὶ τῶν δ.] On the flat roofs of the houses. On the latter part of this verse much question has of late been raised, which never was, as far as I have been able to find, known to the older interpreters. Stier designates it as 'the only passage of Scripture whose words may equally apply to God and the enemy of souls.' He himself is strongly in favour of the latter interpretation, and defends it at much length; but I am quite unable to assent to his opinion. It seems to me at variance with the connexion of the discourse, and with the universal tone of Scripture regarding Satan. If such a phrase as φοβέσθαι τὸν διάβολον could be instanced as = φυλάσσει τὸν δ., or if it could be shewn that any where power is attributed to Satan analogous to that indicated by ὁ δυνάμενος καὶ ψ. κ. σ. ἀπολίσαι ἐν γ., I should then be open to the doubt whether he might not here be intended; but seeing that φοβέσθαι ἀπὸ indicating terror is changed into φοβέσθαι so usually followed by τὸν θεόν in a higher and holier sense (there is no such contrast in ver. 26, and therefore that verse cannot be cited as ruling the meaning of this), and that GOD ALONE is throughout the Scripture the Almighty dispenser of life and death both temporal and eternal, seeing also that Satan is ever represented as the condemned of God, not ὁ δυν. ἀπολ., I must hold by the general interpretation, and believe that both here and in Luke xii. 3—7 our Heavenly Father is intended as the right object of our fear. As to this being inconsistent with the character in which He is brought before us in the next verse, the very change of construction in φοβέσθαι would lead the mind on, out of the terror before spoken of, into that better kind of fear always indicated by that expression when applied to God, and so prepare the way for the next verse. Besides, this sense is excellently in keeping with ver. 29 in another way. 'Fear Him who is the only Dispenser of Death and Life: of death, as here; of life, as in the case of the sparrows for whom He cares.' 'Fear Him, above men: trust Him, in spite of men.' In preparing my 2nd edn., I carefully reconsidered the whole matter, and went over Stier's arguments with the connexion of the discourse before me, but found myself more than ever persuaded that it is quite impossible, for the above and every reason, to apply the words to the enemy of souls. The similar passage, James iv. 12, even in the absence of other considerations, would be decisive. Full as his Epistle is of our Lord's words from this Gospel, it is hardly to be doubted that in ἵς ἵσιν ὁ νομοθέτης καὶ κριτής, ὁ δυνάμενος σῶσαι καὶ ἀπολίσαι, he has this very verse before him. This Stier endeavours to escape, by saying that ἀπολίσαι barely, as the opposite to σῶσαι, is far from being = ψυχὴν ἀπολίσαι in a context like this. But as connected with νομοθέτης καὶ κριτής, what meaning can ἀπολίσαι bear, except that of eternal destruction? The strong things which he says, that his sense will only be doubted as long as men do not search into the depth of the context, &c. do not frighten me. The depth of this part of the discourse I take to be, the setting before Christ's messengers their Heavenly Father as the sole object of childlike trust and childlike fear—the former from His love,—the latter from His power,—His power to destroy, it is not said, them, but absolute, body and soul, in hell. Here is the true depth of the discourse: but if in the midst of this great subject, our Lord is to be conceived as turning aside, upholding as an object of fear the chief enemy, whose ministers and subordinates He is at the very moment commanding us not to fear, and speaking of him (which would indeed be an ἀπὸ ἀπὸ λογόμενον horrendum") as ὁ δυνάμενος

κ. ψ. κ. σὺ. ἀπολείπει ἐν γένει, to my mind all true and deep connexion is broken. It is remarkable how Stier, who so eloquently defends the insertion of ὅτι σου ἢ δούλου in the Lord's Prayer, can so interpret here. Reichel (whose works I have not seen) seems by a note in Stier,
 p. 380, to maintain the above view even more strongly than himself. Lange also, in the Leben Jesu, ii. 2, p. 721, maintained this view: but has now, Bibelwerk
 i. p. 150, retracted it, for reasons the same as those urged here.

32. ὁμολ. ἐν ἐμοί] A Hebraistic or rather perhaps Syriac mode of expression (De Wette) for, 'shall make me the object of His acknowledgment among and before is a practical consistent confession which is meant, and also a practical and end-during denial. The Lord will not confess the confessing Judas, nor deny the denying Peter; the traitor who denied Him in act is denied: the Apostle who confessed Him even to death will be confessed. Cf. 2 Tim. ii. 12. We may observe that both in the Sermon on the Mount (ch. vii. 21—23) and here, after mention of the Father, our Lord describes Himself as the Judge and Arbitrator of eternal life and death.

34.] In Luke xii. 51—53 this announce-the mention of our Lord's own sufferings (ver. 38). As He won His way to victory strife, so must those who come after Him.

 The immediate reference is to the divisions in families owing to conversions to Chris-

Stier well remarks, that under the words ἀξίος μου there lies an exceeding great reward which counterbalances all the seeming asperity of this saying.

38.] How strange must this prophetic announcement have seemed to the Apostles! It was no Jewish proverb (for crucifixion was not a Jewish punishment), no common saying, which our Lord here and so often utters. See ch. xvi. 24; Mark x. 21; Luke ix. 23. He does not here plainly mention His Cross; but leaves it to be understood, see ver. 25. This is one of those sayings of which John xii. 16 was eminently true.

Neander (Leben Jesu, p. 546, note) quotes from Plutarch, de sera numinis vindicta, c. ix., καὶ τῷ περ σώματι τῶν κολαζομένων ἑκαστός κακούργων ἐκφέρει τὸν αὐτοῦ σταυρὸν (meaning, as he explains it, a guilty conscience),—as a proof that our Lord used this saying without any conscious reference to His own Death. But he confesses that if the ὑψοῦν of John xii. 32 is to be understood as there interpreted (ver. 33), he should be ready to allow the allusion here also. Seeing then that we do thus understand it, his inference has no value for us. Besides which, the passage of Plutarch does not even prove the expression to have been proverbial.

39. ψυχὴν . . . αὐτῆν] refer to the same thing, but in somewhat different senses. The first ψυχὴ is the life of this world, which we here all count so dear to us; the second, implied in αὐτῆν, the real life of man in a blessed eternity.

ἐϋρῶν = φιλῶν, John xii. 25 = σώσει θίλων, Mark viii. 34. The past participles are used proleptically, with reference to that day when the loss and gain shall become apparent. But ἐϋρῶν and ἀπολέσας are again somewhat different in position: the first implying earnest desire to save, but not so the second any will or voluntary act to destroy. This is brought out by the ἐνεκεν ἐμοῦ, which gives the ruling providential arrangement whereby the ἀπολείσας is brought about. But besides the primary meaning of this saying as regards the laying down of life literally for Christ's sake, we cannot fail to recognize in it a far deeper sense, in which he who loses his life shall find it. In Luke ix. 23, the taking up of the cross is to be καθ' ἡμέραν; in ch. xvi. 24 || Mk. ἀπαρνησάσθω ἑαυτὸν is joined with it. Thus we have the crucifying of the life of this world,—the death to sin spoken of Rom. vi. 4—11, and life unto God. And this life unto God is the real, true ψυχὴ αὐτοῦ, which the self-denier shall find, and preserve unto life eternal. See John xii. 25 and note.

40.] Here in the conclusion of the discourse, the Lord recurs again to His Apostles whom He was sending out. From ver. 32 has been connected with πᾶς ὅστις, and therefore general. δεχεται, see with the sanction of their master, and for the purpose of confronting them, who were doubtful and jealous of our Lord, with the testimony of His own mouth. This view is ably maintained by Chrysostom; τινος οὖν ἔνεκεν ἐπέμψεν ἰρωτῶν; ἀπεκρίθων τοῦ Ἰησοῦ οἱ Ἰωάννου μαθηταί· καὶ τοῦτο παντὶ που δῆλόν ἐστι· καὶ ζηλοτύπως αἱ πρὸς αὐτὸν εἶχον. καὶ δῆλον ἐξ ὧν πρὸς τὸν διδάσκαλον ἔλεγον (John iii. 26), καὶ πάλιν (John iii. 25), καὶ αὐτῷ πάλιν προσελθόντες ἔλεγον (Matt. ix. 14),—οὕτω γὰρ ἦσαν εἰδότες τις ἦν ὁ χριστός, ἀλλὰ τὸν μὲν Ἰησοῦν ἀνθρώπων ψιλὸν ὑποκρινόμενον, τὸν δὲ Ἰωάννην μείζονα ἢ κατὰ ἀνθρώπων, ἰδένοντο εὐδοκιοῦντα τοῦτον ὁρῶντες, εἰκείνον δὲ, καθὼς ἐπε, λοιπὸν λήγοντα. Hom. xxxvi. p. 408. And similarly Euthymius and Theophylact. This view is also adopted and eloquently defended by Stier, Reden Jesu, 2nd edn., i. p. 392, seq. The objections to this view are,—that the text evidently treats the question as coming from John himself; the answer is directed to John; and the following discourse is on the character and position of John. These are answered by Stier with a supposition that John allowed the enquiry to be made in his name; but surely our Saviour would not in this case have made the answer as we have it, which clearly implies that the object of the miracles done was John's satisfaction. (2) The other great section of opinions on the question is that which supposes doubt to have existed, for some reason or other, in the Baptist's own mind. This is upheld by Tertullian (cont. Marc. iv. 18, vol. ii. p. 402, ed. Migne, not iv. 5, as Dr. Wordsworth: nor is there any ambiguity in the main features of his view, as Dr. W. implies) and others, and advocated by De Wette, who thinks that the doubt was not perhaps respecting our Lord's mission, but His way of manifesting Himself, which did not agree with the theocratic views of the Baptist. This he considers to be confirmed by ver. 6. Olshausen (in loc.) and Neander (Leben Jesu, p. 92) suppose the ground of the doubt to have lain partly in the Messianic idea of the Baptist, partly in the weakening and bedimmed effect of imprisonment on John's mind. Lightfoot carries this latter still further, and imagines that the doubt arose from dissatisfaction at not being liberated from prison by some miracle of our Lord. (Hor. Hebr. in loc.) This however is refuted by Schöttgen (Hor. Hebr. in loc.). The author of the Questiones et Resp. ad Orthodoxos among the works of Justin Martyr suggests, and Benson (Hulsean Lectures for 1820, p. 58 sqq.) takes up, the following solution: ἰκεῖδ' ἡ διάφορος φῆμαι περὶ ὧν ἰκοίησασθαι θαυμάτων ὁ Ἰησοῦς διέτρεχον, τῶν μὲν λεγόντων, Ἐλίας ἐστὶν ὁ ταῦτα ποιῶν· τῶν δὲ, Ἰερμίας· τῶν δὲ, ἄλλος τις τῶν προφητῶν· ταῦτας γὰρ φήμας ἀκούων ὁ Ἰωάννης ἐν τῇ εἰρηγὶ πέμπει τοὺς μαθητάς αὐτοῦ μαθεῖν εἰ ὁ γὰρ σημεῖα ποιῶν αὐτός ἐστιν ὁ ἕκ' αὐτοῦ μαρτυρηθεὶς, ἢ ἕτερός τις ὁ παρὰ τῶν πολλῶν θρυλλούμενος. γνοὺς δὲ ὁ Ἰησοῦς τοῦ Ἰωάννου τὸν σκοπὸν, ἐπὶ τῆς παρουσίας τῶν μαθητῶν Ἰωάννου ἰκοίησθαι πολλὰ θαύματα, πέμψων αὐτοὺς καὶ τὸν Ἰωάννην δι' αὐτῶν ὡς αὐτὸς εἶη ὁ πεποισμένος καὶ γὰρ ἐκ' ὀνόματι ἑτέρων φημιζόμενα θαύματα, ὁ ἕκ' αὐτοῦ μαρτυρηθεὶς. Resp. 38, p. 456. (3) It appears to me that there are objections against each of the above suppositions, too weighty to allow either of them to be entertained. There can be little doubt on the one hand, that our Saviour's answer is directed to John, and not to the disciples, who are bonâ fide messengers and nothing more:—πορευθέντες ἀπαγγέilate Ἰωάννη can I think bear no other interpretation: and again the words μακάριός ἐστιν ὃς ἐάν μὴ σκανδαλισθῇ ἐν ἐμοὶ must equally apply to John in the first place, so that, in some sense, he had been offended at Christ. On the other hand, it is exceedingly difficult to suppose that there can have been in John's own mind any real doubt that our Lord was ὁ ἐρχόμενος, seeing that he himself had borne repeatedly such notable witness to Him, and that under special divine direction and manifestation (see ch. iii. 16, 17: John i. 26—37). The idea of his objective faith being shaken by his imprisonment is quite inconsistent not only with John's character, but with our Lord's discourse in this place, whose description of him seems almost framed to guard against such a supposition. The last hypothesis (that of the Pseudo-Justin) is hardly probable, in the form in which it is put. We can scarcely imagine that John can have doubted who this Person was, or have been confounded by the discordant rumours which reached him about His wonderful works. But that one form of this hypothesis is the right one, I am certainly disposed to believe, until some more convincing considerations shall induce me to alter my view. (4) The form to which I allude is this: John having heard all these reports, being himself fully convinced Who this Wonderworker was, was becoming impatient under the slow and unostentatious course of our Lord's self-manifestation, and desired to obtain from our Lord's own mouth a declaration which should set such rumours at rest, and (possibly) which might serve for a public profession of His Messiahship, from which hitherto He had seemed to shrink. He thus incurs a share of the same rebuke which the mother of our Lord received (John ii. 4); and the purport of the answer returned to him is, that the hour was not yet come for such an open declaration, but that there were sufficient proofs given by the works done, to render all inexcusable, who should be offended in Him. And the return message is so far from being a satisfaction designed for the disciples, that they are sent back like the messenger from Gabii to Sextus Tarquinius, with indeed a significant narrative to relate, but no direct answer; they were but the intermediate transmitters of the symbolic message, known to Him who sent it, and him who received it.

It is a fact not to be neglected in connexion with this solution of the difficulty, that John is said to have heard of the works, not τοῦ Ἰησοῦ, but τοῦ χριστοῦ: the only place where that name, standing alone, is given to our Lord in this Gospel. So that it would seem as if the Evangelist had purposely avoided saying τοῦ Ἰησοῦ, to shew that the works were reported to John not as those of the Person whom he had known as Jesus, but of the Deliverer—the Christ; and that he was thus led to desire a distinct avowal of the identity of the two. I have before said that the opening part of the ensuing discourse seems to have been designed to prevent, in the minds of the multitude, any such unworthy estimations of John as those above cited. The message and the answer might well beget such suspicions, and could not from the nature of the case be explained to them in that deeper meaning which they really bore; but the character of John here given would effectually prevent them, after hearing it, from entertaining any such ideas. 2. ἀκούσας]

From his own disciples, Luke vii. 18. The place of his imprisonment was Machærus. ὁ μὲν ὑποψία τοῦ Ἡρώδου δέσμιος εἰς τὸν Μαχαιροῦντα πέμφθεις, . . . (μεθόριον δὲ ἴσθι τῆς τε Ἀρίτα καὶ Ἡρώδου ἀρχῆς) . . . ταύτῃ κρινύνται, Jos. Antt. xviii.

5.] The words νεκροὶ ἐγ. have raised some difficulty; but surely without reason. In Luke, the raising of the widow's son at Naim immediately precedes this message; and in this Gospel we have had the ruler's daughter raised. These miracles might be referred to by our Lord under the words ver. 17.; for it is to be observed that He bade them tell John not only what things they saw, but what things they had heard, as in Luke.

It must not be forgotten that the words here used by our Lord have an inner and spiritual sense, as betokening the blessings and miracles of divine grace on the souls of men, of which His outward and visible miracles were symbolical. The words are mostly cited from Isa. xxxv. 5, where the same spiritual meaning is conveyed by them. They are quoted here, as the words of Isa. liii. are by the Evangelist in ch. viii. 17, as applicable to their partial external fulfilment, which however, like themselves, pointed onward to their greater spiritual completion. εὐαγγελίζονται is passive,—see reff. and 2 Kings xviii. 31 in the LXX. In ref. Luke it is also passive, but with the thing preached as its subject. Stier remarks the coupling of these miracles together, and observes that with vic. iy. is united πτωχοὶ εὐαγγελίζονται, as being a thing hitherto unheard of and strange, and an especial fulfilment of Isa. lxi. 1.

6.] See note on ver. 2. 7-30.] The discourse divides itself into TWO PARTS: (1) vv. 7-19, the respective characters and mutual relations of John and Christ: (2) vv. 20-30, the condemnation of the unbelief of the time—ending with the gracious invitation to all the weary and heavy laden to come to Him, as truly ὁ ἐρχόμενος. 7.] The following verses set forth to the people the real character and position of John; identifying him who cried in the wilderness with him who now spoke from his prison, and assuring them that there was the same dignity of office and mission throughout. They are not spoken till after the departure of the disciples of John, probably because they were not meant for them or John to hear, but for the people, who on account of the question which they had heard might go away with a mistaken depreciation of John. ὁ πολλὸς ὄχλος ἐκ τῆς ἐρωτήσεως τῶν Ἰωάννου μαθητῶν πολλὰ ἐν ἀγορᾷ ἐπινόησιν οὐκ εἰδὼς τὴν γυνήν μεθ' ἧς ἐπιμψε τοὺς μαθητάς. καὶ εἰδὼς ἣν διαλογίζεσθαι Chrysostom, Hom. xxxvii. p. 414. And our Lord, as usual, takes occasion, from reminding them of the impression made on them by John's preaching of repentance, to set forth to them deep truths regarding His own Kingdom and Office.

8. ἄλλὰ] If it was not that, . . . ; so in Demosth. Coron. p. 233, τί γὰρ καὶ βουλόμενοι μετεπίμπεσθ' ἐν αὐτοῖς; ἐπὶ τὴν εἰρήνην; ἀλλ' ὁπῆρχεν ἄσασιν. ἀλλ' ἐπὶ τὸν πόλεμον: see Klotz, Devar. p. 5. τί ἐξήλθατε] The repetition of this question, and the order of the suggestive answers, are remarkable. The first sets before them the scene of their desert pilgrimage—the banks of Jordan with its reeds (as Dr. Burton quotes from Lucian Hermotim., κάλαμος ἐν' ὄχθῃ ποταποταμίῃ περὶ πᾶν καὶ πρὸς πᾶν τὸ νῆριον σαλευόμενος);—but no such trifles were the object of the journey: this suggestion is rejected without an answer. The second reminds them that it was a man—but not one in soft clothing, for such are not found in deserts. The third brings before them the real object of their pilgrimage in his holy office, and even amplifies that office itself. So that the great Forerunner is made to rise gradually and sublimely into his personality, and thus his preaching of repentance is revived in their minds. ἐν μαλακοῖς] Contrast this with the garb of John as described ch. iii. 4. Such an one, in soft raiment, might be the forerunner of a proud earthly prince, but not the preacher of repentance before a humble and suffering Saviour; might be found as the courtly flatterer in the palaces of kings, but not as the stern rebuker of tyrants, languishing in their fortress dungeons.

9. προφήτην] We read, ch. xxi. 26, that 'all accounted John as a prophet.'

περισσότερον is neuter, not masculine (as always in N. T.); as πλεον, ch. xii. 41, 42. R. V. rightly, more than a prophet.

—John was more than a prophet, because he did not write of, but saw and pointed out, the object of his prophecy;—and because of his proximity to the kingdom of God. He was moreover more than a prophet, because he himself was the subject as well as the vehicle of prophecy. But with deep humility, he applies to himself only that one, of two such prophetic passages, which describes him as φωνὴ βοῶντος, and omits the one which gives him the title of ὁ ἀγγελὸς μου, here cited by our Lord.

10. σου] Our Lord here changes the person of the original prophecy, which is μου. And that He does so, making that which is said by Jehovah of Himself, to be addressed to the Messiah, is, if such were needed (compare also Luke i. 16, 17, and 76), no mean indication of His own eternal and co-equal Godhead. It is worthy of remark that all three Evangelists quote this prophecy similarly changed, although St. Mark has it in an entirely different place. The student should compare the passage in the LXX with the three citations,—h. l., Mark i. 2, and Luke vii. 27. Also, that the high dignity and honour which our Lord here predicates of the Baptist, has a further reference: He was thus great above all others, because he was the forerunner of Christ. How great then above all others and him, must HE be.

11. ἐγήγε-

γεννητοῖς is most likely masculine. See reff.

ὁ δὲ μικρό-

 τερὸς, ἐν τῇ βασιλείᾳ τῶν οὐρανῶν μείζων αὐτοῦ ἐστίν." μικρότερος, κατὰ τὴν ἡλικίαν καὶ κατὰ τὴν τῶν πολλῶν δόξαν, καὶ γὰρ ἔλεγον αὐτὸν φάγον καὶ ἐνοσφίτην καὶ "οὐχ οὗτός ἐστιν ὁ τοῦ τίκτανος υἱός;" καὶ πανταχοῦ αὐτὸν ἐξηπύλιζον. Hom. xxxvii. p. 416. And a little afterwards:—περὶ ἑαυτοῦ λίγων ἐκώτης κρύπτει τὸ πρόσωπον διὰ τὴν ἐκ κρα-τοῦσαν ὑπόνοιαν καὶ τὸ μὴ δόξαι περὶ ἑαυτοῦ μέγα τι λίγειν καὶ γὰρ πολλαχοῦ φαίνεται τοῦτο ποιῶν. τί δὲ ἐστίν "ἐν τῇ βασιλείᾳ τῶν οὐρανῶν;" ἐν τοῖς πνευμαcourse. We may certainly say that our Lord in such a passage as this would not designate Himself as ὁ μικρότερος compared with John, in any sense: nor again is it our Lord's practice to speak of Himself as one ἐν τῇ βασιλείᾳ τῶν οὐρανῶν, or of His own attributes as belonging to or dependent on that new order of things which this expression implies, and which was in Him rather than He in it. Besides, the bare use of the comparative δ μικρότερος, with its reference left to be inferred, is, unless I am mistaken, unprecedented. If this had been the meaning, we should surely have had αὐτοῦ after μικρότερος. Again, the analogy of such passages as Matt. v. 19; xviii. 1, would lead us to connect the preceding adjective μικρότερος with ἐν τῇ β. r. ob., and not the following. The other, the usual interpretation, I am convinced, is the right one: but he that is least in the kingdom of heaven, is greater than he. The comparative with the article is not put for the superlative, although in English we are obliged to render it so, but signifies 'he that is less than all the rest' (Winer, § 36. 3); and here is generic, of all the inferior ones. There is very likely an allusion to Zech. xii. 8: "He that is feeble among them at that day shall be as David."

Thus the parallelism is complete: John, not inferior to any born of women—but these, even the least of them, are born of another birth (John i. 12, 13; iii. 5). John, the nearest to the King and the Kingdom—standing on the threshold—but never having himself entered; these, ἐν τῇ βασιλείᾳ, subjects and citizens and indwellers of the realm, ἐν τῷ πολιτειᾷ ἐν οὐρανοῖς. He, the friend of the Bridegroom: they, however weak and unworthy members, His Body, and His Spouse.

Meyer, giving in substance the above interpretation, believes that αὐτοῦ, i. e. Ἰωάν. τοῦ β., is to be supplied after μικρότερος. This would be unobjectionable in sense, but is it, in usage? See reff., and remember that ἐν τ. βασ. . . . is equivalent in meaning to τῶν ἐν τ. βασιλείᾳ. Maldonatus (cited by Meyer) quotes the logical axiom, 'minimum maximi est majus maximo minimi.' 12.] The sense of this verse has been much disputed. (1) βιάζεται has been taken in a middle sense; 'forcibly introduces itself,' 'breaks in with violence,' as in the similar passage Luke xvi. 16, πᾶς εἰς αὐτὴν βιάζεται. Certainly such a sense agrees better with ἀγανατίζειν, which we find in Luke, than the passive explanation of βιάζεται: but it seems inconsistent with the latter half of the verse to say that it breaks in by force, and then that others break by force into it. (2) βιάζεται is taken passively; so πόλις . . . τὰς βεβαιομένης, Xen. Hell. v. 2. 15 (Meyer)—which is however, like many of his citations, incorrect: 'suffereth violence,' E. V. And thus the construction of the verse is consistent: 'and the violent take it by force.' Believing this latter interpretation to be right, we now come to the question, in what sense are these words spoken? Is βιάζεται in a good or a bad sense? Does it mean, 'is taken by force,' and the following, 'and men violently press in for their share of it, as for plunder;'—or does it mean, 'is violently resisted, and violent men tear it to pieces?' (viz. its opponents, the Scribes and Pharisees?) This latter meaning bears no sense as connected with the discourse before us. The subject is not the resistance made to the kingdom of heaven, but the difference between a prophesied and a present kingdom of heaven. The fifteenth verse closes this subject, and the complaints of the arbitrary prejudices of 'this generation' begin with ver. 16. We conclude then that these words imply From the days of John the Baptist until now (i. e. inclusively, from the beginning of his preaching), the kingdom of heaven is pressed into, and violent persons—eager, ardent multitudes—seize on it. Of the truth of this, notwithstanding our Lord's subsequent reproaches for unbelief, we have abundant proof from the multitudes who followed, and outwent Him, and thronged the doors where He was, and would (John vi. 15) take Him by force (the very word ἀρπάξω being used) to make Him a king. But our Lord does not mention this so much to commend the βιασται, as to shew the undoubted fact that ὁ ἐρχόμενος was come—that the kingdom of heaven, which before had been the subject of distant prophecy, a closed fortress, a treasure hid, was now undoubtedly upon earth (Luke xvii. 21 and note), laid open to the entrance of men, spread out that all might take. Thus this verse connects with ver. 22, δεῦτε πρὸς με πάντες, and with Luke

xvi. 16, πᾶς ἐς αὐτὴν βιάζεται. Compare also with this throwing open of the kingdom of heaven for all to press into, the stern prohibition in Exod. xix. 12, 13, and the comment on it in Heb. xii. 18—24.

[13, 14.] The whole body of testimony as yet has been prophetic,—the Law and Prophets, from the first till Zacharias the priest and Simeon and Anna prophesied; and according to the declaration of prophecy itself, John, in the spirit and power of Elias, was the forerunner of the great subject of all prophecy. Neither this—nor the testimony of our Lord, ch. xvii. 12—is inconsistent with John's own denial that he was Elias, John i. 21. For (1) that question was evidently asked as implying a re-appearance of the actual Elias upon earth: and (2) our Lord cannot be understood in either of these passages as meaning that the prophecy of Malachi iv. 6 received its full completion in John. For as in other prophecies, so in this, we have a partial fulfilment both of the coming of the Lord and of His forerunner, while the great and complete fulfilment is yet future—at the great day of the Lord. Mal. iv. 1.

ὁ μέλλων ἔρχεσθαι here may not be = ὁς ἐμελλεν ἔρχεσθαι (as Bengel, 'sermo est tanquam e prospectu testamenti veteris in novum'), but is perhaps strictly future, who shall come. Compare ch. xvii. 11, where the future is used. The εἰ θέλετε δεῖσθαι must be taken as referring to the partial sense of the fulfilment implied: for it was (and is to this day) the belief of the Jews that Elias in person should come before the end.

[15.] These words are generally used by our Lord when there is a further and deeper meaning in His words than is expressed: as here—'if John the Baptist is Elias, and Elias is the forerunner of the coming of the Lord, then know surely that the Lord is come.'

[16, 17] Implying 'the men of this generation have ears, and hear not; will not receive this saying; are arbitrary, childish, and prejudiced, not knowing their own mind.'

[τίνι ὁμοιωσω:] See similar questions in Mark iv. 30: Luke xiii. 18, 20; and note on ch. vii. 24. ὁμοία ἐστὶν παιδίοις: as children in their games imitate the business and realities of life, so these in the great realities now before them shew all the waywardness of children. The similitude is to two bodies of children, the one inviting the other to play, first at the imitation of a wedding, secondly at that of a funeral;—to neither of which will the others respond. Stier remarks that the great condescension of the preaching of the Gospel is shewn forth in this parable, where the man sent from God, and the eternal Word Himself, are represented as children among children, speaking the language of their sports. Compare Heb. ii. 14. It must not be supposed that the two bodies of children are two divisions of the Jews, as some (e.g. Olah.) have done: the children who call are the Jews,—those called to, the two Preachers; both belonging, according to the flesh, to ἡ γενεὰ αὐτῆς,—but neither of them corresponding to the kind of mourning (in John's case) with which the Jews would have them mourn, or the kind of joy (in the Lord's case) with which the Jews would have them rejoice. The converse application, which is commonly made, is against the ὁμοία ἐστὶν παιδίοις, by which the first παιδία must be the children of this generation; and nothing can be more perplexed than to render ὁμοία ἐστὶν 'may be illustrated by,' and invert the persons in the parable. Besides which, this interpretation would lay the waywardness to the charge of the Preachers, not to that of the Jews.

18. μῆτρ. ^{εσθ. μῆτρ. πιν.]} Luke vii. 33 fills up this expression by inserting ^{αφρον} and ^{ολβον}. See ch. iii. 4. The neglect of John's preaching, and rejection of his message, is implied in several places of the Gospels (see ch. xxi. 23—27: John v. 35, ^{προς ωραν}); but hence only do we learn that they brought against him the same charge which they afterwards tried against our Lord. See John vii. 20; x. 20.

19. ^{εσθιων} και ^{πινων}] Alluding to our Lord's practice of frequenting entertainments and feasts, e. g. the marriage at Cana, the feast in Levi's house, &c. See also ch. ix. 14. και = and yet; see John xvi. 32.

η σοφία, the divine wisdom which hath ordered these things.

εδικ. was justified—the same tense as ηλθεν both times—refers to the event, q. d., 'they were events in which wisdom was justified, &c.' The force of the aorist is not to be lost by giving a present meaning to either of the verbs. The meaning seems to be, that the waywardness above described was not universal, but that the ^{τινα σοφιας} (in allusion probably to the Book of Proverbs, which constantly uses similar expressions: see ch. ii. 1; iii. 1, 11, 21; iv. 1, &c.) were led to receive and justify (= clear of imputation) the Wisdom of God, who did these things. Cf. Luke vii. 29, where in this same narrative it is said, ^{οι τελωναι} ^{εδικαιωσαν τον θιον, βαπτισθητες το βαπτισμα} ^{ιωαννου}. The ^{τινα σοφιας} are opposed to the wayward ^{ταυδια} above, the childlike to the childish; and thus this verse serves as an introduction to the saying in ver. 25. Chrysostom understands the verse differently: ^{ρευριστιν, ι} ^{και ομεις οτε εκπισθητε, αλλ ιμοι λαπων} ^{εγκαλειν οτε εχετε}. Thus ^{ομεις} = ^{οι τελωναι} ^{της σοφ.}, as being the people of the Lord; and ^{η σοφια} is our Lord Himself. This seems far-fetched, and not so consistent with the context as the other interpretation. ^{εωε} (ref.), not exactly equivalent to ^{επε}, but implying 'at the hands of' the person whence the justification comes. 20—30.] SECOND PART

OF THE DISCOURSE. See on ver. 7.

20. τότε ἤρξατο] This expression betokens a change of subject, but not of locality or time. The whole chapter stands in such close connexion, one part arising out of another (e. g. this out of ver. 18—19), and all pervaded by the same great undertone, which sounds forth in vv. 28—30, that it is quite impossible that this should be a collection of our Lord's sayings uttered at different times. I would rather regard the τότε ἤρξατο as a token of the report of an ear-witness, and as pointing to a pause or change of manner on the part of our Lord. See note on Luke x. 13. ὅτι εἰς μερ.] Connect this with the first subject of our Lord's preaching, ch. iv. 17. The reference is to some unrecorded miracles, of which we know (Luke iv. 23: John xxi. 25) that there were many.

21. Χοραζαῖν] According to Jerome (cited by Winer, Realwörterbuch) a town of Galilee, two (according to Eusebius twelve, but most likely an error in the transcriber) miles from Capernaum. It is no where mentioned except here and in the similar place of Luke. The etymology is uncertain. Some would read χώρα ζιν.

Βηθσαιδάν] Called πόλις John i. 45,—αὐτῇ Mark viii. 23,—in Galilee John xii. 21;—on the western bank of the lake of Gennesaret, near the middle, not far from Capernaum; the birth-place of Simon Peter, Andrew, and Philip. Both this and Chorazin appear to be put as examples of the lesser towns in which our Lord had wrought His miracles (the κωμοπόλεις of Mark i. 38), as distinguished from Capernaum, the chief town (ver. 23) of the neighbourhood.

Τύρῳ κ. Σιδῶνι] These wealthy cities, so often the subject of prophecy, had been chastised by God's judgment under Nebuchadnezzar and Alexander, but still existed (Acts xii. 20; xxi. 3, 7; xxvii. 8). ἐν σάκῳ κ. σποδῷ. μερ. is probably an allusion to Jonah iii. 6, or to general Eastern custom.

23.] The sense has been variously interpreted. Some suppose it to allude to the distinguished honour conferred on Capernaum by our Lord's residence there. So Euthymius: ἡ Καπριναοὺμ ἐνδοξος γίγνεται διὰ τὸ κατοικεῖν ἐν αὐτῇ τὸν χριστὸν καὶ τὰ πολλὰ τῶν θαυμάτων ἐν αὐτῇ τελεῖσθαι. Others (as Grotius) to the rich fisheries carried on at Capernaum, by means of which the town was proud and prosperous. Jerome says, 'Ideo ad inferna descendes, quia contra predicationem meam superbissime restitisti.' He also mentions the first interpretation. Others, as Stier (Reden Jesu, i. 491), refer the expression to the lofty situation of Capernaum, which however is very uncertain. The first interpretation appears to me the most probable, seeing that our Lord chose that place to be the principal scene of His ministry and residence, ἡ ἰδία πόλις ch. ix. 1. The very sites of these three places have it revealed here, that the rest and joy of the Christian soul is, to become like Christ; to attain by His teaching this πραό-sen makes an excellent distinction between ταπεινὸς τῇ καρδίᾳ an attribute of divine Love in the Saviour, and ταπεινὸς or πτωχὸς τῷ πνεύματι, ch. v. 3: Prov.

 man, knowing his unworthiness and need of help. καρδίας is only here used of Christ. (Stier on John xiv. 1.) 30.]

 See 1 John v. 8. Owing to the conflict with evil ever incident to our corrupt nature even under grace, the ἀνάπαυσις which Christ gives is yet to be viewed as a yoke and a burden, seen on this its painful side, of conflict and sorrow; but it is a light yoke; the inner rest in the soul giving a peace which passeth understanding, and bearing it up against all. See

 1—5. In Mark and Luke this incident occurs after the discourse on fasting related Matt. ix. 14 sq.; but in the former without any definite mark of time: St.
 Mark has ἵνα ἐκείνη παραπορεύσθαι αὐτὸν ἐν τοῖς σάββασιν κ.τ.λ.: St. Luke ἵνα δὲ ἐν σαββάτῳ [διευρηκώτερον] κ.τ.λ., on which see note there. The expression ἐν ἐκείνῳ τῷ καιρῷ is, I conceive, a more definite mark of connexion than we find in the other Gospels, but cannot here be fixed to the meaning which it clearly has

in ch. xi. 25, where the context determines it. We can merely say that it seems to have occurred about the same time as the last thing mentioned—in the same journey or season. The plucking the ears was allowed Deut. xxiii. 25, but in the Talmud expressly forbidden on the Sabbath. (Lightfoot in loc.) It was also (Levit. xxiii. 14, apparently, but this is by no means certain: see note on Luke) forbidden until the sheaf of first-fruits had been presented to God, which was done on the second day of the feast of unleavened bread at the Passover. This incident, on that supposition, must have occurred between that day and the harvest. It is generally supposed to have been on the first Sabbath after the Passover. For a fuller discussion of the time and place, see note on Luke as before. 3.] It appears from 1 Sam. xxi. 6, that hot bread had been put in on the day of David's arrival; which therefore, Levit. xxiv. 8, was a sabbath. The example was thus doubly appropriate. Bengel maintains, on the commonly received interpretation of σάβ. δευτερόπρωτον Luke vi. 1, that 1 Sam. xxi. was the lesson for the day. But the Jewish calendar of lessons cannot be shewn to have existed in the form which we now have, in the time of the Gospel history. 4.] εἰ μὴ, in the construction, is not for ἀλλὰ, but belongs to εὖκ ἔξον ἦν, and retains its proper meaning of except.

5.] The priests were ordered to offer double offerings on the Sabbath (Num. xxviii. 9, 10), and to place fresh (holi, and therefore baked that day) shewbread. In performing these commands they must commit many of what the Pharisees would call profanations of the Sabbath. So that, as Stier (ii. 4), not only does the sacred history furnish examples of exception to the law of the Sabbath from necessity, but the Law itself ordains work to be done on the Sabbath as a duty. 6.] μεῖζον seems the better supported reading, and sustains the parallel better: a greater thing than the temple is here. See John ii. 19. The inference is, 'If the priests in the temple and for the temple's sake, for its service and ritual, profane the Sabbath, as ye account profanation, and are blameless, how much more these disciples who have grown hungry in their appointed following of Him who is greater than the temple, the true Temple of God on earth, the Son of Man!' I cannot agree with Stier that the neuter would represent only "something greater, more weighty than the temple,—namely, merciful consideration of the hungry, or the like:” it seems to me, as above, to bear a more general and sublime sense than the masculine; see ver. 41, &c. 7.] The law of this new

Temple-service is the law of charity and love:—mercy and not sacrifice, see ch. ix. 13;—all for man's sake and man's good;—and if their hearts had been ready to receive our Lord, and to take on them this service, they would not have condemned the guiltless. 8.] On the important verse preceding this in Mark ii. 27, see note there. The sense of it must here be supplied to complete the inference. Since the Sabbath was an ordinance instituted for the use and benefit of man,—the Son of Man, who has taken upon Him full and complete Manhood, the great representative and Head of humanity, has this institution under his own power. See this teaching of the Lord illustrated and expanded in apoctolic practice and injunctions, Rom. xiv. 4, 5, 17: Col. ii. 16, 17.

9. μεταβὰς ἰκεῖθεν] This change of place is believed by Greswell to have been a journey back to Galilee after the Passover. (Diss. viii. vol. ii.) It is true that no such change is implied in Mark and Luke; but the words here point to a journey undertaken, as in ch. xi. 1; xv. 29, the only other places in this Gospel where the expression occurs. In John vii. 8, the cognate expression μεταβηθι ἐντεῦθεν is used of a journey from Galilee to Judaea. So that certainly it is not implied here (as Meyer, al., suppose) that the incident took place on the same day as the previous one. We know from Luke vi. that it was on another (the next?) sabbath.

ἀντὺν, not, of the Pharisees; but of the Jews generally, of the people of the place.

10.] This narrative is found in Mark and Luke with considerable variation in details from our text, those two Evangelists agreeing however with one another. In both these accounts, they (the Scribes and Pharisees, Luke) were watching our Lord to see whether He would heal on the Sabbath:—and He (knowing their thoughts, Luke) ordered the man to stand forth in the midst, and asked them the question here given. The question about the animal does not occur in either of them, but in Luke xiv. 5, on a similar occasion. The additional particulars given are very interesting. By Luke,—it was the right hand; by Mark,—our Lord looked round on them μετ' ὀφθῆς, συλλυποῦμενος ἐπὶ τῇ περὶ αὐτοῦ τῆς καρδίας ἀντὺν:—and the Herodians were joined with the Pharisees in their counsel against Him. construction of this verse is involved:
 there is a double question, as in ch. vii. 9.

Our Lord evidently asks this as being a thing allowed and done at the time when He spoke: but subsequently (perhaps, suggests Stier, on account of these words of Christ), it was forbidden in the Gemara; and it was only permitted to lay planks for the beast to come out.
 12.] Our Lord does no outward act: the healing is performed without even a word of command. The stretching forth the hand was to prove its soundness, which the divine power wrought in the act of stretching it forth. Thus his enemies were disappointed, having no legal ground against Him. 14.] This is the first mention of counsel being taken by the Pharisees (and Herodians, Mark, as above) to put our Lord to death.

and note. ^{24.} οἱ δὲ φ. ἀποσώ.] St. Mark states (iii. 23) that this accusation was brought by the γραμματεῖς οἱ ἐπὶ Ἱεροσολύμων καταβάντες. Luke (xi. 15), by τινὲς ἐξ αὐτῶν, i. e. τῶν δούλων. On the charge itself, Trench remarks, 'A rigid monotheistic religion like the Jewish, left but one way of escape from the authority of miracles, which once were acknowledged to be indeed such, and not mere collusions and sleights of hand. There remained nothing to say but that which we find in the N. T. the adversaries of our Lord continually did say, namely, that these works were works of hell.'

^{25.]} The Pharisees said this covertly to some among the multitude; see Luke, vv. 15, 17. "There is at first sight a difficulty in the argument which our Saviour draws from the oneness of the kingdom of Satan: viz. that it seems the very idea of this kingdom, that it should be this anarchy; blind rage and hate not only against God, but each part of it warring against every other part. And this is most deeply true, that hell is as much in arms against itself as against Heaven: neither does our Lord deny that in respect of itself that kingdom is infinite contradiction and division: only He asserts that in relation to the kingdom of goodness it is at one: there is one life in it and one soul in relation to that. Just as a nation or kingdom may embrace within itself infinite parties, divisions, discords, jealousies, and heart-burnings: yet, if it is to subsist as a nation at all, it must not, as regards other nations, have lost its sense of unity; when it does so, of necessity it falls to pieces and perishes." Trench, Miracles, p. 58. We may observe (1) that our Lord here in the most solemn manner re-asserts and confirms the truths respecting the kingdom of evil which the Jews also held. The βασιλείαι are so set parallel with one another, that the denial of the reality of the one with its ἀρχων, or the supposing it founded merely in assent on the part of our Lord to Jewish notions, inevitably brings with it the same conclusions with regard to the other. They are both real, and so is the conflict between them. (2) That our Lord here appeals not to an insulated case of casting out of devils, in which answer might have been made, that the craft of Satan might sometimes put on the garb and arts of an adversary to himself, for his own purposes,—but to the general and uniform tenor of all such acts on his part, in which He was found as the continual Adversary of the kingdom of Satan. (3) That our Lord proceeds to shew that the axiom is true of all human societies, even to a family, the smallest of such. (4) That He does not state the same of an individual man, 'Every man divided against himself, falleth,' rests upon deeper grounds, which will be entered on in the notes on vv. 30, 31. ^{27.]} The interpretation of this verse has been much disputed; viz. as to whether the casting out by the οἱ μαθηταί (scholars,—disciples; see 2 Kings ii. 3 and passim) were real or pretended exorcisms. The occurrence mentioned Luke ix. 49 does not seem to apply; for there John says, ἐπιστάτα, εἶδον ἕνα ἐπὶ τῷ ὀνόματί σου ἐκβάλλοντα δ., which hardly could have been the case with those here referred to. Nor again can the περιερχόμενοι Ἰουδαίαι ἐξορκισται of Acts xix. 13

be the same as these, inasmuch as they also named over the possessed the name of the Lord Jesus: or at all events it can be no such invocation which is here referred to. In Josephus (Antt. viii. 2. 5) we read that Solomon γρότους ἰερακώσεων κατέλειπεν, οἷς ἐνδόμυνα τὰ δαιμόνια ὡς μηκίρ' ἐπανελεῖν ἐκδιώκουσι. καὶ αὕτη μέχρι νῦν παρ' ἡμῶν ἡ θαρραλία πλείστον ἰσχύει. It is highly necessary to institute this enquiry as to the reality of their exorcisms: for it would leave an unworthy impression on the reader, and one very open to the cavils of unbelief, were we to sanction the idea that our Lord would have solemnly compared with his own miracles, and drawn inferences from, a system of imposture, which on that supposition, these Pharisees must have known to be such. I infer then that the vioi Φαρ. did really cast out devils; and I think this view is confirmed by what the multitudes said in ch. ix. 33, where upon the dumb speaking after the devil was cast out they exclaimed οὐδὲ ποτε ἰφάνη οὕτως ἐν τῷ Ἰσραήλ: meaning that this was a more complete healing than they had ever seen before. The difficulty has arisen mainly from forgetting that miracles, as such, are no test of truth, but have been permitted to, and prophesied of, false religions and teachers. See Exodus vii. 22; viii. 7: ch. xxiv. 24, &c.; Deut. xiii. 1—5. There is an important passage in Justin Martyr, Dial. with Trypho, § 85, p. 182, as follows:—κατὰ γὰρ τοῦ ὀνόματος αὐτοῦ τούτου τοῦ υἱοῦ τοῦ θεοῦ . . . πᾶν δαιμόνιον ἰερακίζομενον νικᾶται καὶ ὑποτάσσεται. εἰ μὴ κατὰ παντός ὀνόματος τῶν παρ' ὑμῖν γεγενημένων ἡ βασιλείων, ἡ δικαίων, ἡ προφητῶν, ἡ πατριαρχῶν ἰερακίζηται δαίμεις, οὐχ ὑποταγῆσεται οὐδὲν τῶν δαι-μονίων. ἀλλ' εἰ ἄρα ἰερακίζοι τις ὑμῶν κατὰ τοῦ θεοῦ Ἀβραάμ καὶ θεοῦ Ἰσαὰκ καὶ θεοῦ Ἰακώβ, ἰσως ὑποταγήσεται. Irenæus (cited by Grotius) says that "hujus invocatione etiam ante adventum Domini nostri salvabantur homines a spiritibus nequissimis, et a daemoniis universis," and adds, "Judæi usque nunc hanc ipsa invocatione daemonas fugant." Jer., Chrys., Hil., understand vioi ἡμῶν . . . ὃ δὲ λίγει τοιοῦτόν ἐστιν. Οἱ ἀπόστολοι ἐν τίνι ἐκβάλλουσι; . . . θέλω δειξάει ὅτι φθόνου ἦν τοῦ πρὸς αὐτὸν τὰ ἱερμῖνα μόνον. . . . 'before you looked for it,'—as Stier and Wesley. It does not seem to occur in this latter sense in the N. T. But Fritzsche's dictum, "Alexandrinis scriptoribus φθάνειν nihil nisi venire, pervenire, pertinere valet," ad Rom. ii. 356, certainly is not right; for we have it indisputably in the sense of to anticipate, present, 1 Thess. iv. 15.

29.] Luke has the word ἰσχυρότερος applied to the spoiler in this verse; a title given to our Lord by the Baptist, ch. iii. 11 ||, and also in prophecy, Isa. xl. 10 (μετὰ ἰσχύος, LXX). See also Isa. liii. 12 (LXX); xlix. 24, 25. See note on Luke xi. 21 f., which is the fuller report of this parabolic saying. ^{30.} These words have been variously understood. Chrysostom and Euthymius understand them to refer to the devil: Bengel, Schleiermacher, and Neander, to the Jewish exorcists named above. Grotius and others understand it as merely a general proverb, and the ἑμοῦ to mean 'any one,' and here to apply to Satan, the sense being, 'If I do not promote Satan's kingdom, which I have proved that I do not, then I must be his adversary.' But this is on all accounts improbable: see below on ἐνδύων and σκορπίζει. I believe Stier is right in regarding it as a saying setting forth to us generally the entire and complete disjunction of the two kingdoms, of Satan and God. There is and can be in the world no middle party: they who are not with Christ, who do not gather with Him,—are against Him and his work, and as far as in them lies are undoing it. See Rom. viii. 7. And thus the saying connects itself with the following verse:—this being the case, διὰ τοῦτο λέγω ὑμῖν,—the sin of an open belying of the present power of the Holy Spirit of God working in and for his Kingdom, assumes a character surpassingly awful. This saying is no way inconsistent with that in Mark ix. 40; Luke ix. 50. That is not a conversion of this, for the terms of the respective propositions are not the same. See note on Mark ix. 40. As usual, this saying of our Lord reached further than the mere occasion to which it referred, and spoke forcibly to those many half-persuaded hesitating persons who flattered themselves that they could strike out a line avoiding equally the persecution of men and the rejection of Christ. He informed them (and informs us also) of the impossibility of such an endeavour. In the συνέγων there is an allusion to the idea of gathering the harvest: see ch. xiii. 30: John xi. 52, and for σκορπίζει, John x. 12, in all which places the words exactly bear out their sense here. ^{31, 32.} διὰ τοῦτο, because this is the case: see last note. Notice again the λέγω ὑμῖν, used by our Lord when He makes some revelation of things hidden from the sons of men: see ch. vi. 29, and xviii. 10, 19: and ver. 36 below. The distinction in these much-controverted verses seems to be, between (1) the sin and blasphemy which arises from culpable ignorance and sensual blindness, as that of the fool who said in his heart 'There is no God,'—of those who, e. g. Saul of Tarsus, opposed Jesus as not being the Christ; which persons, to whatever degree their sin may unhappily advance, are capable of enlightenment, repentance, and pardon:—and (2) the blasphemy of those who, acknowledging God, and seeing his present power working by his Holy Spirit, openly oppose themselves to it, as did, or as were very near doing (for our Lord does not actually imply that they had incurred this dreadful charge), these Pharisees. They may as yet have been under the veil of ignorance; but this their last proceeding, in the sight of Him who knows the hearts, approximated very near to, or perhaps reached, this awful degree of guilt. The principal misunderstanding of this passage has arisen from the prejudice which possesses men's minds owing to the use of the words, 'the sin against the Holy Ghost.' It is not a particular species of sin which is here condemned, but a definite act shewing a state of sin, and that state a wilful determined opposition to the present power of the Holy Spirit; and this as shewn by its fruit, βλασφημία.

 λιθον εἰς ἡ βάλλειν, ἡ λόγον ἄργόν, Pythag. in Stobæus, xxxiv. 11. Wetst.
 ἄργος = ἀργός, and is perhaps best taken here in its milder and negative sense, as not yet determined on till the judgment:
 so that our Lord's saying is a deduction
 "a minori," and if of every ῥῆμα ἄργόν, then how much more of every ῥῆμα πονηρόν!

^{37.} The λόγος being the πει-ρασματα της καρδιας, is a specimen of what is within; is the outward utterance of the man, and on this ground will form a subject of strict enquiry in the great day, being a considerable and weighty part of our works.

^{38.} St. Luke (xi. 15, 16) places the accusation of casting out devils by Beelzebub and this request together, and then the discourse follows. It seems that the first part of the discourse gave rise, as here related, to the request for a sign (from Heaven); but, as we might naturally expect, and as we learn from St. Luke, on the part of different persons from those who made the accusation. In consequence of our Lord declaring that his miracles were wrought by the Holy Ghost, they wish to see some decisive proof of this by a sign, not from Himself, but from Heaven. The account in ch. xvi. 1—4 manifestly relates to a different occurrence: see notes there. Cf.

 John vi. 30, 31; xii. 28.

The expression σημεῖον ἐξ οὐ αυτῇ does not, as De Wette maintains, exclude our Lord's miracles from being σημεῖα: but is the direct answer to their request in the sense in which we know they used σημεῖον, 'a sign, not wrought by Him, and so able to be suspected of magic art, but one from Heaven.' Besides, even if this were not so, how can the refusing to work a miracle to satisfy them, affect the nature or signification of those wrought on different occasions, and with a totally different view? And yet on ground like Red Sea, near the present Aden (see Plin.

 vi. 23), abounding in spice and gold and precious stones. 43.] ὅταν, not 'whenever'; the indefinite conj. does not assert universality, but is hypothetical; δὲ connects strictly with what has preceded.
 This important parable, in the similitude itself, sets forth to us an evil spirit driven out from a man, wandering in his misery and restlessness through desert places, the abodes and haunts of evil spirits (see Isa.
 xiii. 21, 22; xxxiv. 14), and at last determining on a return to his former victim, whom he finds so prepared for his purposes, that he associates with himself seven other fiends, by whom the wretched man being possessed, ends miserably. In its interpretation we may trace three distinct references, each full of weighty instruction. (1) The direct application of the parable is to the Jewish people, and the parallel runs thus:—The old daemon of idolatry brought down on the Jews the Babylonish captivity, and was cast out by it. They did not after their return fall into it again, but rather endured persecution, as under Antiochus Epiphanes.
 The emptying, sweeping, and garnishing may be traced in the growth of Pharisaic hypocrisy and the Rabbinical schools between the return and the coming of our Lord. The re-possession by the one, and accession of seven other spirits more malicious (πονηρότερα) than the first, hardly needs explanation. The desperate infatuation of the Jews after our Lord's ascension, their bitter hostility to His Church, their miserable end as a people, are known to all.

 Chrysostom, who gives in the main this interpretation, notices their continued infatuation in his own day: and instances their joining in the impieties of Julian.
 (2) Strikingly parallel with this runs the history of the Christian Church. Not long after the apostolic times, the golden calves of idolatry were set up by the Church of Rome. What the effect of the captivity was to the Jews, that of the Reformation has been to Christendom.
 The first evil spirit has been cast out.
 But by the growth of hypocrisy, secularity, and rationalism, the house has become empty, swept, and garnished: swept and garnished by the decencies of civilization and discoveries of secular knowledge, but empty of living and earnest faith.
 And he must read prophecy but ill, who does not see under all these seeming improvements the preparation for the final development of the man of sin, the great re-possession, when idolatry and the seven πνεύματα πονηρότερα shall bring the outward frame of so-called Christendom to a fearful end. (3) Another important fulfilment of the prophetic parable may be found in the histories of individuals. By religious education or impressions, the devil has been cast out of a man; but how often do the religious lives of men spend themselves in the sweeping and garnishing (see Luke xi. 39, 40), in formality and hypocrisy, till utter emptiness of real faith and spirituality has prepared them for that second fearful invasion of the Evil One, which is indeed worse than the first! (See Heb. i. 4, 6: 2 Pet. ii. 20—22.)

46—50.] HIS MOTHER AND BROTHERS SEEK TO SPEAK WITH HIM. Mark iii. 31—35. Luke viii. 19—21. In Mark the incident is placed as here: in Luke, after the parable of the sower. 46.] In Mark iii. 21 we are told that his relations went out to lay hold on Him, for they said, He is beside Himself: and that the reason of this was his continuous labour in teaching, which had not left time so much as to eat. There is nothing in this care for his bodily health (from whatever source the act may have arisen on the part of his brethren, see John vii. 5) inconsistent with the known state of his mother's mind (see Luke ii. 19, 51). They stood ἔξω, i. e. outside the throng of hearers around our Lord; or, perhaps, outside the house. He meets their message with a reproof, which at the same time conveys assurance to His humble hearers. He came for all men: and though He was born of a woman, He, who is the second Adam, taking our entire humanity on Him, is not on that account more nearly united to her, than to all those who are united to Him by the Spirit; nor bound to regard the call of earthly relations so much as the welfare of those whom He came to teach and to save. It is to be noticed that our Lord, though He introduces the additional term ἀδελφὴ into his answer, does not (and indeed could not) introduce πατήρ, inasmuch as He never speaks of an earthly Father. See Luke ii. 49. All these characteristics of the mother of our Lord are deeply interesting, both in themselves, and as building up, when put together, the most decisive testimony against the fearful superstition which has assigned to her the place of a goddess in the Romish mythology. Great and inconceivable as the honour of that meek and holy woman was, we find her repeatedly (see John ii. 4) the object of rebuke from her divine Son, and hear Him here declaring, that the honour is one which the humblest believer in Him has in common with her.

Stier remarks (Reden Jesu, li. 57 note), that the juxtaposition of sister and mother in the mouth of our Lord makes it pro-

CHAP. XIII. 1—52.] THE SEVEN PARABLES. (The parallels, see under each.)

1, 2.] Mark iv. 1. 1. ἐν τῇ ἡμέρᾳ ἐκείνῃ] These words may mean literally in the same day. But it is not absolutely necessary. The words certainly do bear that meaning in Mark iv. 85, and important consequences follow (see note there); but in Acts viii. 1 they are as evidently indefinite. The instances of their occurrence in John (xiv. 20; xvi. 23, 26) are not to the point, their use there being prophetic. ἀπὸ τῆς ἐκ. perhaps implies that the foregoing discourse was delivered in a house, as some have thought: but the article need not (any more than τὸ before πλοίων, see notes on ch. ix. 1, 28) imply any particular house.

3. ἐν παραβολαῖς] The senses of this word in the N. T. are various, and may be found in the lexicons. My present concern with it is to explain its meaning as applied to the "parables" of our Lord. (1) The Parable is not a Fable, inasmuch as the Fable is concerned only with the maxims of worldly prudence, whereas the parable conveys spiritual truth. The Fable in its form rejects probability, and teaches through the fantasy, introducing speaking animals, or even inanimate things; whereas the Parable adheres to probability, and teaches through the imagination, introducing only things which may possibly happen. ἵνα παραβολῇ λόγος ὡς περὶ γινόμενου, μὴ γινόμενου μὲν κατὰ τὸ ῥητόν, δυναμένου δὲ γίνεσθαι. Origen, cited by Trench on the Parables, p. 4. (2) Nor is the Parable a Myth: inasmuch as in Mythology the course of the story is set before us as the truth, and simple minds receive it as the truth, only the reflective mind penetrating to the distinction between the vehicle and the thing conveyed; whereas in the Parable these two stand distinct from one another to all minds, so that none but the very simplest would ever believe in the Parable as fact. (3) Nor is the Parable a Proverb: though παραβολή is used for δοῦναι in the N. T. (Luke iv. 23; v. 36; Matt. xv. 14, 15), and παροιμία in John for a parable (John x. 6; xvi. 26, 29). It is indeed more like a Proverb than either of the former; being an expanded Proverb, and a Proverb a concentrated parable, or fable, or result of human experience expressed without a figure. Hence it will be seen that the Proverb ranges far wider than the parable, which is an expansion of only one particular case of a proverb. Thus 'Physician heal thyself' would, if expanded, make a parable; 'ne res Minervam,' a fable; 'honesty is the best policy,' neither of these. (4) Nor is the Parable an Allegory: inasmuch as in the Allegory the imaginary persons and actions are placed in the very places and footsteps of the real ones; and stand there instead of them, declaring all the time by their names or actions who and what they are. Thus the Allegory is self-interpreting, and the persons in it are invested with the attributes of those represented; whereas in the Parable the courses of action related and understood run indeed parallel, but the persons are strictly confined to their own natural places and actions, which are, in their relation and occasion, typical of higher things. (5) It may well hence be surmised what a Parable is. It is a serious narration, within the limits of probability, of a course of action pointing to some moral or spiri-

Real Truth ('Collatio per narratiunculam fictam, sed veri similem, serio illustrans rem sublimiorem.' Unger, de Parabolis Jesu [Meyer]); and derives its force from real analogies impressed by the Creator of all things on His creatures. The great Teacher by Parables therefore is He who needed not that any should testify of man; for He knew what was in man, John ii. 25: moreover, He made man, and orders the course and character of human events. And this is the reason why none can, or dare, teach by parables, except Christ. We do not, as He did, see the inner springs out of which flow those laws of eternal truth and justice, which the Parable is framed to elucidate. Our parables would be in danger of perverting, instead of guiding aright. The Parable is especially adapted to different classes of hearers at once: it is understood by each according to his measure of understanding. See note on ver. 12. The seven Parables related in this chapter cannot be regarded as a collection made by the Evangelist as relating to one subject, the Kingdom of Heaven and its development; they are clearly indicated by ver. 53 to have been all spoken on one and the same occasion, and form indeed a complete and glorious whole in their inner and deeper sense. The first four of these parables appear to have been spoken to the multitude from the ship (the interpretation of the parable of the sower being interposed); the last three, to the disciples in the house. From the expression ἤρξατο here compared with the question of the disciples in ver. 10,—and with ver. 34,—it appears that this was the first beginning of our Lord's teaching by parables, expressly so delivered, and properly so called. And the natural sequence of things here agrees with, and confirms Matthew's arrangement against those who would place (as Ebrard) all this chapter before the Sermon on the Mount. He there spoke without parables, or mainly so; and continued to do so till the rejection and misunderstanding of his teaching led to His judicially adopting the course here indicated, χωρίς παρ. οὐδὲν ἰσχύει αὐτοῖς. The other order would be inconceivable: that after such parabolic teaching, and such a reason assigned for it, the Lord should, that reason remaining in full force, have deserted his parabolic teaching, and opened out his meaning as plainly as in the Sermon on the Mount. 3—9.]

10.] οἱ μαθηταὶ = οἱ περὶ αὐτὸν σὺν τοῖς δώδεκα Mark. This question took place during a pause in our Lord's teaching, not when He had entered the house, ver. 36. The question shews the newness of this method of teaching to the disciples. It is not mentioned in Mark : only the enquiry into the meaning of the parable just spoken : nor in Luke ; but the answer implies it.

11.] The Kingdom of Heaven, like other Kingdoms, has its secrets (μυστήρια),—see a definition by St. Paul in Rom. xvi. 25 f.,—viz. χρόνους αἰώνιους σιγημένον, φανερωθὲν ἐν ᾧ (and inner counsels, which strangers must not know. These are only revealed to the humble diligent hearers, ἐμῖν : to those who were immediately around the Lord with the twelve ; not ἀλλοις = τοῖς λοιποῖς Luke, = ἑτεροῖς τοῖς ἔξω

Mark. (1 Cor. v. 12, 13.) οὐ δέδοται = ἐν παραβολαῖς Luke, and τὰ πάντα γίνεσθαι Mark. 12.] In this saying of the Lord is summed up the double force—the revealing and concealing properties of the parable. By it, he who hath,—he who not only hears with the ear, but understands with the heart, has more given to him ; and it is for this main purpose undoubtedly that the Lord spoke parables : to be to His Church revelations of the truth and mysteries of His Kingdom. But His present purpose in speaking them, as further explained below, was the quality possessed by them, and declared in the latter part of this verse, of hiding their meaning from the hard-hearted and sensual. By them, he who hath not, in whom there is no spark of spiritual desire nor meekness to receive the engrafted word, has taken from him even that which he hath ("seemeth to have," Luke) ; even the poor confused notions of heavenly doctrine which a sensual and careless life allow him, are further bewildered and darkened by this simple teaching, into the depths of which he cannot penetrate so far as even to ascertain that they exist. No practical comment on the latter part of this saying can be more striking, than that which is furnished to our day by the study of the German rationalistic (and, I may add, some of our English harmonistic) Commentators ; while at the same time we may rejoice to see the approximate fulfilment of the former in such commentaries as those of Olshausen, Neander, Stier, and Trench. In ch. xxv. 29, the fuller mean-brought out by our Lord. 13.] ὅτι

 for our guide, we have ὅτις οὐκ ἔχει =

 The difficulties raised on these variations,
 and on the prophecy quoted in vv. 14, 15,

 bearing the same meaning. αὐτοῖς

 Mark. This citation gives no countenance to the fatalist view of the passage, but rests the whole blame on the hard-heartedness and unreadiness of the hearers, which is of itself the cause why the very preach-darkening and condemning them (see 2 βλέποντες & βλέπετε: and for δικαιοι we have βασιλεις. On the fact that prophets, &c. desired to see those things, see 2 Sam. xiii. 5: Job xix. 23—27: also Exod. iv. 13, and Luke ii. 29—32.

18—23.] INTERPRETATION OF THE PARABLE OF THE SOWER. Mark iv. 10—20. Luke viii. 9—18, who incorporate with the answer of our Lord to the request of the disciples, much of our last section. 18.] ἀκούσατε, in the sense of the verse before—hear the true meaning of, 'hear in your hearts.' With regard to the Parable itself, we may remark that its great leading idea is that μυστήριον τῆς βασιλείας, according to which the grace of God, and the receptivity of it by man, work ever together in bringing forth fruit. The seed is one and the same every where and to all: but seed does not spring up without earth, nor does earth bring forth without seed; and the success or failure of the seed is the consequence of the adaptation to its reception, or otherwise, of the spot on which it falls. But of course, on the other hand, as the enquiry, 'Why is this ground rich, and that barren?' leads us up into the creative arrangements of God,—so a similar enquiry in the spiritual interpretation would lead us into the inscrutable and sovereign arrangements of Him who 'preventeth us that we may have a good will, and worketh with us when we have that will' (Art. X. of the Church of England). See, on the whole, my Sermons before the University of Cambridge, February, 1858.

19.] In Luke we have an important preliminary declaration, implied indeed here also: ὁ σπείρων ἐστὶν ὁ λόγος τοῦ θεοῦ. This word is in this parable especially meant of the word preached, though the word written is not excluded: nor the word unwritten—the providences and judgments, and even the creation, of God. (See Rom. x. 17, 18.) The similitude in this parable is alluded to in 1 Pet. i. 23: James i. 21.

The sower is first the Son of Man (ver. 37), then His ministers and servants (1 Cor. iii. 6) to the end. He sows over all the field, unlikely as well as likely places; and commands His sowers to do the same, Mark xvi. 15. Some, Stier says, (Reden Jesu, ii. 76, ed. 2,) have objected to the parable a want of truthful correspondence to reality, because sowers do not thus waste their seed by scattering it where it is not likely to grow; but, as he rightly answers,—the simple idea of the parable must be borne in mind, and its limits not transgressed—'a sower went out to sow'—his sowing—sowing over all places, is the idea of the parable. We see him only as a sower, not as an economist. The parable is not about Him, but about the seed and what happens to it. He is the fit representative τοῦ διδόντος θεοῦ πᾶσιν ἀπλῶς καὶ μὴ ὀνειδίζοντος, James i. 5.

παντὸς κ.τ.λ.] an anacoluthon, to throw the emphasis on παντὸς κ.τ.λ., for ὁ πονηρὸς . . . κ. ἀρπάζει τὸ ἐσπ. ἐν τῇ καρδ. παντὸς κ.τ.λ. καὶ μὴ συνιέντος is peculiar to Matthew, and very important; as in Mark and Luke this first class of hearers are without any certain index to denote them. The reason of μὴ συνιέντος is clearly set forth by the parable: the heart is hardened, trodden down; the seed cannot penetrate.

ὁ πονηρὸς = ὁ σατανᾶς (Mark, who also inserts εὐθύς), = ὁ διάβολος (Luke). The parable itself is here most satisfactory as to the manner in which the Evil One proand come to maturity: or while it is so coming.—(2) in APPARENT DEGREE. The climax is apparently from bad to better;—the first understand not: the second understand and feel: the third understand, feel, and practise. But also (3) in REAL DEGREE, from bad to worse. Less awful is the state of those who understand not the word and lose it immediately, than that of those who feel it, receive it with joy, and in time of trial fall away: less awful again this last, than that of those who understand, feel, and practise, but are fruitless and impure.

It has been noticed also that the first is more the fault of careless inattentive CHILDHOOD; the second of ardent shallow YOUTH; the third of worldly self-seeking AGE. (II) That these classes do not EXCLUDE one another. They are great general divisions, the outer circles of which fall into one another, as they very likely might in the field itself, in their different combinations.

23.] Here also the fourth class must not be understood as a decided well-marked company, excluding all the rest. For the soil is not good by nature: the natural man receiveth not the things of the Spirit of God; but every predisposition to receive them is of God:—even the shallow soil covering the rock, even the thorny soil, received its power to take in and vivify the seed, from God. So that divine grace is the enabling, vivifying, cleansing power throughout: and these sown on the good land are no naturally good, amiable, or pure class, but those prepared by divine grace—receptive, by granted receptive power. The sowing is not necessarily the first that has ever taken place: the field has been and is continually resown, so that the care of the husbandman is presupposed. Again, no irresistible grace or absolute decree of God must be dreamt of here. God working not barely upon, but with man, is, as we said above, the μυστήριον τῆς βασιλείας here declared,—see Jer. iv. 3: Hosea x. 12: Gal. vi. 7. See note on Luke viii. 15. ἑκατόν, ἐξήκοντα, τριάκοντα, the different degrees of faithfulness and devotedness of life with which fruit is brought forth by different classes of persons. There is no point of comparison with the different classes in the parable of the talents: for he who had five talents yielded the same increase as he who had two.

συνιόν] So συνιούσιν ver. 13, and 2 Cor. x. 12 (rec.), and this word itself Rom. iii. 11, from συνίω, i. q. συνίμι,—of which the inf. συνιέν is found in Theognis, 565. It should be accented συνιών, or συνίων (from συνίω), not συνιών, which would be from σύνιμι. See Winer, § 14. 3.

darnel, or bastard wheat (lolum album), so often seen in our fields and by our hedgerows; if so, what follows will be explained, that the tares appeared when the wheat came into ear, having been previously not noticeable. It appears to be an Eastern word, expressed in the Talmud by תריח.

Our Lord was speaking of an act of malice practised in the East:—persons of revengeful disposition watch the ground of a neighbour being ploughed, and in the night following sow destructive weeds. (Roberts's Oriental Illustrations,

p. 541, cited by Trench on the Parables, p. 68.) (The practice is not unknown even in England at present. Since the publication of the first edition of this commentary, a field belonging to the Editor, at Gaddeby in Leicestershire, was maliciously sown with charlock [sinapis arvensis] over the wheat. An action at law was brought by the tenant, and heavy damages obtained against the offender.)

29.] Jerome in loc. says: 'Inter triticum et zizania quod nos appellamus lolium, quamdiu herba est, et nondum culmus venit ad spicam, grandis similitudo est, et in discernendo nulla aut perdifficilis distantia.' Jerome, it must be remembered, resided in Palestine. As regards the construction, αμα is not a prep. governing αβροις, but merely an adv. used for elucidation; see Klotz,

31, 32.] THIRD PARABLE. THE GRAIN OF MUSTARD SEED. Mark iv. 30—34: Luke xiii. 18, 19. On the connexion of this parable with the two last, Chrysostom observes (Hom. in Matt. xvi. p. 483), ἐπειδὴ γὰρ εἶπεν ὅτι ἀπὸ τοῦ σπόρου γρία μίση ἀπέλλεται, καὶ σώζεται ἐν, καὶ ἐν αὐτῇ πάλιν τῇ σωζομένην τοσαύτη γίνεται βλάστη, ἵνα μὴ λέγωσι 'καὶ τίνας καὶ πόσαι ἔσονται αἱ πιστοί'; καὶ τοῦτον ἔκαστὸν τὸν φέρον, δὲ τῆς παραβολῆς τοῦ σινάπεως ἐνάγων εἰς πίστιν αὐτοῦ; καὶ δεικνὺς ὅτι πάντως ἐκταθήσεται τὸ πρᾶγμα. The comparison of kingdoms to trees was familiar to the Jews: see Daniel

iv. 10—12, 20—22: Ezek. xxxi. 3—9; xvii. 22—24: Ps. lxxx. 8—11. 31.] ἐν τ. ἀργῇ = εἰς τ. κήπ. Luke.

32. μικρότερον κ.τ.λ.] less than all, not for the superlative. The words are not to be pressed to their literal sense, as the mustard seed was a well-known Jewish type for any thing exceedingly small.

The mustard tree attains to a large size in Judaea. Lightfoot quotes (Hor. Hebr. in l.) Hieros. Peab. fol. 20. 2, 'Caulis erat sinapis in Sichin, e quo enati sunt rami tres; e quibus unus decerpit cooperuit tentoriolum figuli, produxitque tres cabos sinapis. Rabbi Simeon ben Chalapha dixit, Caulis sinapis erat mihi in agro meo, in quam ego scandere solitus sum, ita ut scandere solent in ficum.'

This parable, like most others respecting the kingdom of God, has a double reference—general and individual. (1) In the general sense, the insignificant beginnings of the kingdom are set forth: the little babe cast in the manger at Bethlehem; the Man of sorrows with no place to lay His Head; the crucified One; or again the hundred and twenty names who were the seed of the Church after the Lord had ascended; then we have the Kingdom of God waxing onward and spreading its branches here and there, and different nations coming into it. "He must increase," said the great Forerunner. We must beware however of imagining that the outward Church-form is this Kingdom. It has rather reversed the parable, and is the worldly power waxed to a great tree and the Churches taking refuge under the shadow of it. It may be, where not corrupted by error and superstition, subservient to the growth of the heavenly plant: but is not itself that plant. It is at best no more than (to change the figure) the scaffolding to aid the building, not the building itself. (2) The individual application of the parable points to the small beginnings of divine grace; a word, a thought, a passing sentence, may prove to be the little seed which eventually fills and shadows the whole heart and being, and calls 'all thoughts, all passions, all delights' to come and shelter under it. Jerome has a comment on this parable (in loc.) too important to be passed over: 'Prædicatio Evangelii minima est omnibus disciplinis. Ad primam quippe doctrinam, fidem non habet veritatis, hominem Deum, Deum mortuum, et scandalum crucis prædicans. Confer hujusmodi doctrinam dogmatibus Philosophorum et libris eorum, et splendori eloquentiæ, et

33.] FOURTH PARABLE. THE LEAVEN. Luke xiii. 20, 21. Difficulties have been raised as to the interpretation of this parable which do not seem to belong to it. It has been questioned whether ζύμη must not be taken in the sense in which it so often occurs in Scripture, as symbolic of pollution and corruption. See Exod. xii. 15, and other enactments of the kind, passim in the law; and ch. xvi. 6: 1 Cor. v. 6, 7. And some few have taken it thus, and explained the parable of the progress of corruption and deterioration in the outward visible Church. But then, how is it said that the Kingdom of Heaven is like this leaven? For the construction is not the same as in ver. 24, where the similitude is to the whole course of things related, but answers to κόκκῳ συνάπτως, ὃν λαβὼν ἀνθ.: so ζύμη, ἣν λαβοῦσα γυνή. Again, if the progress of the Kingdom of Heaven be towards corruption, till the whole is corrupted, surely there is an end of all the blessings and healing influence of the Gospel on the world. It will be seen that such an interpretation cannot for a moment stand, on its own ground; but much less when we connect it with the parable preceding. The two are intimately related. That was of the inherent self-developing power of the Kingdom of Heaven as a seed containing in itself the principle of expansion; this, of the power which it possesses of penetrating and assimilating a foreign mass, till all be taken up into it. And the comparison is not only to the power but to the effect of leaven also, which has its good as well as its bad side, and for that good is used: viz. to make wholesome and fit for use that which would otherwise be heavy and insalubrious. Another striking point of comparison is in the fact that leaven, as used ordinarily, is a piece of the leavened loaf put amongst the new dough—(τὸ ζυμωθὲν ἀπ᾽ ἐξ ζύμης γίνεται τῷ λοιπῷ πάλιν. Chrys. Hom. xli. p. 484)—just as the Kingdom of Heaven is the renewal of humanity by the righteous Man Christ Jesus.

The Parable, like the last, has its general and its individual application: (1) in the penetrating of the whole mass of humanity, by degrees, by the influence of the Spirit of God, so strikingly witnessed in the earlier ages by the dropping of heathen customs and worship;—in modern times more gradually and secretly advancing, but still to be plainly seen in the various abandonments of criminal and unholy practices (as e. g. in our own time of slavery and duelling, and the increasing abhorrence of war among Christian men), and without doubt in the end to be signally and universally manifested. But this effect again is not to be traced in the establishment or history of so-called Churches, but in the hidden advancement, without observation, of that deep leavening power which works irrespective of human forms and systems. (2) In the transforming power of the 'new leaven' on the whole being of individuals. "In fact the Parable does nothing less than set forth to us the mystery of regeneration, both in its first act, which can be but once, as the leaven is but once hidden; and also in the consequent (subsequent?) renewal by the Holy Spirit, which, as the ulterior working of the leaven, is continual and progressive." (Trench, p. 97.) Some have contended for this as the sole application of the parable; but not, I think, rightly.

As to whether the γυνή has any especial meaning, (though I am more and more convinced that such considerations are not always to be passed by as nugatory,) it will hardly be of much consequence here to enquire, seeing that γυναῖκες σιτοποιῶσι would be every where a matter of course.

ἐγκρέπτω has given rise to a technical word ἱγκρυφία, signifying a leavened cake (which however, Passow, Lex. explains to be a cake baked under hot ashes, thus applying the

Three of these, an ephah, appears to have been the usual quantity prepared for a baking: see Gen. xviii. 6: Judg. vi. 19: 1 Sam. i. 24. This being the case, we need not perhaps seek for any symbolical interpretation: though Olsh.'s hint that the body, soul, and spirit may perhaps be here intended can hardly but occur to us, and Stier's, that "of the three sons of Noah was the whole earth overspread," is worth recording.

Psalm contains no parable, and that consequently these words can only be cited out of their context, we must remember that such a view is wholly inconsistent with any deep insight into the meaning of the Scripture record: for the whole Psalm consists of a recounting of events which St. Paul assures us τοῖσι ἡμῶν ἰγενήθησαν τυκτικῶς συνέβαινον ἐκείνοις, ἰγρόφῃ δὲ πρὸς νεοθισίαν ἡμῶν. 1 Cor. x. 6, 11.

^{36—42.} INTERPRETATION OF THE PARABLE OF THE TARES OF THE FIELD. Peculiar to Matthew. ^{38.} This verse has been variously interpreted, notwithstanding that its statements are so plain. The consideration of it will lead us into that of the general nature and place of the parable itself. The field is the world; if understood of the Church, then the Church only as commensurate with the world, κοινωθίς εἰς τὸν κόσμον ὅπως ἐκείνη τὸ εὐαγγέλιον πάσῃ τῇ κτίσει (Mark xvi. 15); THE CHURCH standing for THE WORLD, not, the world for the Church. (This latter view, Stier says, Augustine upholds against the Donatists: but I cannot find it in his Ep. contra Donatistas, where he several times plainly asserts the field to be commensurate with the world, and the Church to be the

'triticum inter zizania.') And the parable has, like the former ones, its various references to various counterworkings of the Evil One against the grace of God. Its two principal references are, (1) to the whole history of the world from beginning to end; the coming of sin into the world by the malice of the devil,—the mixed state of mankind, notwithstanding the development of God's purposes by the dispensations of grace,—and the final separation of the good and evil at the end. The very declaration 'the harvest is the end of the world' suggests the original sowing as the beginning of it. Yet this sowing is not in the fact, as in the parable, one only, but repeated again and again. In the parable the Lord gathers as it were the whole human race into one lifetime, as they will be gathered in one harvest, and sets that forth as simultaneous, which has been scattered over the ages of time. But (2) as applying principally to the βαρ. r. οὖρ. which lay in the future and began with the Lord's incarnation, the parable sets forth to us the universal sowing of GOOD SEED by the Gospel: it sows no bad seed: all this is done by the enemy, and further we may not enquire. Soon, even as soon as Acts v. in the History of the Church, did the tares begin to appear; and in remarkable coincidence with the wheat bringing forth fruit (see Acts iv. 32—37). Again, see Acts xiii. 10, where Paul calls Elymas by the very name υἱὸς διαβόλου. And ever since, the same has been the case; throughout the whole world, where the Son of Man sows good seed, the Enemy sows tares. And it is not the office, however much it may be the desire, of the servants of the householder, the labourers in His field, to collect or root up these tares, to put them out of the world literally, or of the Church spiritually (save in some few exceptional cases, such as that in Acts v.); this is reserved for another time and for other hands,—for the harvest, the end; for the reapers, the angels. (3) It is also most important to notice that, as the Lord here gathers up ages into one season of seed time and harvest, so He also gathers up the various changes of human character and shiftings of human will into two distinct classes. We are not to suppose that the wheat can never become tares, or the tares wheat: this would be to contradict the purpose of Him who willeth not the death of a sinner, but rather that he should be converted and live; and this gracious purpose shines through the command ἀρετὴ συναντάνεσθαι ἀμώτερα—let time be given (as above) for the leaven to work. As in the parable of the sower, the various classes were the concentrations of various dispositions, all of which are frequently found in one and the same individual, so here the line of demarcation between wheat and tares, so fixed and impassable at last, is during the probation time, the time of συναβήτην, not yet determined by Him who will have all to be saved, and to come to the knowledge of the truth. In the very first example, that of our first parents, the good seed degenerated, but their restoration and renewal was implied in the promises made to them, and indeed in their very punishment itself; and we their progeny are by nature the children of wrath, till renewed by the same grace. The parable is delivered by the Lord as knowing all things, and describing by the final result; and gives no countenance whatever to predestinarian error. (4) The parable has an historical importance, having been much in the mouths and writings of the Donatists, who, maintaining that the Church is a perfectly holy congregation, denied the applicability of this Scripture to convict them of error, seeing that it is spoken not of the Church but of the world: missing the deeper truth which would have led them to see that, after all, the world is the Church, only overrun by these very tares. τὸ δὲ καλὸν σπ., οὗτοί εἰσιν strikingly sets forth again the identity of the seed, in its growth, with those who are the plants: see above on ver. 19. οἱ υἱοὶ τ. βαρ.] not in the same sense as in ch. viii. 12,—sons there, by covenant and external privilege: here,—by the effectual grace of adoption: the KINGDOM, there, in mere paradigm, on this imperfect earth: here, in its true accomplishment, in the new heavens and earth wherein

44.] FIFTH PARABLE. THE HIDDEN TREASURE. Peculiar to Matthew. This and the following parable are closely connected, and refer to two distinct classes of persons who become possessed of the treasure of the Gospel. Notice that these, as also the seventh and last, are spoken not to the multitude but to the disciples.

In this parable, a man, labouring perchance for another, or by accident in passing, finds a treasure which has been hidden in a field; from joy at having found it he goes, and selling all he has, buys the field, thus (by the Jewish law) becoming the possessor also of the treasure. Such hiding of treasure is common even now, and was much more common in the East (see Jer. xli. 8 [cf. Hitzig in loc.]: Job iii. 21:

Prov. ii. 4). This sets before us the case of a man who unexpectedly, without earnest seeking, finds, in some part of the outward Church, the treasure of true faith and hope and communion with God; and having found this, for joy of it he becomes possessor, not of the treasure without the field (for that the case supposes impossible) but of the field at all hazards, to secure the treasure which is in it: i. e. he possesses himself of the means of grace provided in that branch of the Church, where, to use a common expression, he has "gotten his good:" he makes that field his own.

45, 46.] SIXTH PARABLE. THE PEARL OF GREAT PRICE. In this parable our Lord sets before us, that although in ordinary cases of finding 'the truth as it is in Jesus,' the buying of the field is the necessary prelude to becoming duly and properly possessed of it; yet there are cases, and those of a nobler kind, where such condition is not necessary. We have here a merchantman,—one whose business it is,—on the search for goodly pearls; i. e. a man who intellectually and spiritually is a seeker of truth of the highest kind. "He whom this pursuit occupies, is a merchantman; i. e. one trained, as well as devoted, to business. The search is therefore determinate, discriminate, unremitting. This case then corresponds to such Christians only as from youth have been trained up in the way which they should go. In these alone can be the settled habits, the effectual self-direction, the convergence to one point of all the powers and tendencies of the soul, which are indicated by the illustration." (Knox's Remains, i. 460.) But as the same writer goes on to observe, even here there is a discovery, at a particular time. The person has been seeking, and finding, goodly pearls; what is true, honest, just, pure, lovely, and of good report: but at last he finds one pearl of great price—the efficacious principle of inward and spiritual life. We hear of no emotion, no great joy of heart, as before; but the same decision of conduct: he sells all and buys it. He chooses vital Christianity, at whatever cost, for his portion. But here is no field. The pearl is bought pure—by itself. It is found, not unexpectedly in the course of outward ordinances,—with which therefore it would become to the finder inseparably bound up,—but by diligent search, spiritual and immediate, in its highest and purest form.

Trench instances (Parables, p. 100) Nathanael and the Samaritan woman as examples of the finders without seeking;—Augustine, as related in his Confessions (we might add St. Paul, see Phil. iii. 7), of the diligent seeker and finder. Compare with this parable Prov. ii. 3—9, and to see what kind of buying is not meant, Isa. lv. 1: ch. xxv. 9, 10. Also see Rev. iii. 18.

47—52.] SEVENTH PARABLE. THE DRAW-NET. Peculiar to Matthew.

47.] σαγήνη is a drag, or draw-net, drawn over the bottom of the water, and permitting nothing to escape it. The leading idea of this parable is the ultimate separation of the holy and unholy in the Church, with a view to the selection of the former for the master's use. We may notice that the fishermen are kept out of view and never mentioned: the comparison not extending to them. A net is cast into the sea and gathers of every kind (of fish: not of things, as mud, weeds, &c., as Stier supposes); when this is full, it is drawn to shore, and the good collected into vessels, while the bad (the legally unclean, those out of season, those putrid or maimed) are cast away. This net is the Church gathering from the sea (a common Scripture similitude for nations: see Rev. xvii. 15: Isa. viii. 7: Ps. lxxv. 7) of the world, all kinds (see Rev. vii. 9); and when it is full, it is drawn to the bank (the limit of the ocean, as the συντελεια is the limit of the αἰών), and the angels (not the same as the fishers, as Olshausen maintains; for in the parable of the tares the servants and reapers are clearly distinguished) shall gather out the wicked from among the just, and cast them into everlasting punishment. It is plain that the comparison must not be strained beyond its limits, as our Lord shews us that the earthly here gives but a faint outline of the heavenly. Compare the mere ἔξω ἱβαλον of the one, with the fearful anti-type of vv. 49, 50. On δ κα. κ. δ βρ. see note on ch. viii. 12. 51, 52.]

SOLENN CONCLUSION OF THE PARABLES. When our Lord asks, 'Have ye understood all these things?' and they answer, 'Yea, Lord,' the reply must be taken as spoken from their then standing-point, from which but little could be seen of that inner and deeper meaning which the Holy Spirit has since unfolded. And this circumstance explains the following parabolic remark of our Lord: that every γραμματεὺς (they, in their study of the Lord's sayings, answering to the then γραμματεῖς in their study of the Law) who is μαθητευθείς, enrolled as a disciple and taught as such, is like an householder (the Great Householder being the Lord Himself, compare ch. xxiv. 45) who puts forth from his store new things and old; i. e. 'ye yourselves, scribes of the Kingdom of Heaven, instructed as ye shall fully be in the meaning of these sayings, are (shall be) like householders, from your own stores of knowledge respecting them hereafter bringing out, not only your present understanding of them, but ever new and deeper meanings.' And this is true of πᾶς γρ. κ. ρ. λ. Every real spiritually-learned scribe of the Kingdom of Heaven is able, from the increasing stores of his genuine experimental knowledge of the word (not merely from books or learning, or the Bible itself, but ἐκ τοῦ θεο. αὐτοῦ), to bring forth things new and old.

The δὲ τοῦτο is an expression of consequence, but not a strong one: answering nearly to our Well, then.

This is perhaps the fittest place to make a few general remarks on this wonderful cycle of Parables. We observe, (1) How naturally they are evolved from the objects and associations surrounding our Lord at the time (see on this the very interesting section of Stanley, Sinai and Palestine, ch. xiii. § 2, p. 420 ff., "On the Parables"). He sat in a boat in the sea, teaching the people who were on the land. His eye wandered over the rich plain of Gennesareth (where πᾶν περιτεύσσιν οἱ νεμόμενοι, Jos. B. J. iii. 10. 8, and Robinson, iii. 290) :- the field-paths, the stony places, the neglected spots choked with wild vegetation (οὕτε γὰρ αὐτῇ τι φυτόν ἀρνῦραι διὰ τὴν πλότητα, ib.), the plots of rich and deep soil, were all before him. The same imagery prevails in the parable of the tares of the field, and in that of the mustard seed; and the result of the tilling of the land is associated with the leaven in the lump. Then He quits the sea-shore and enters the house with the disciples. There the link to the former parable is the exposition of the tares of the field. From the working of the land for seed to finding a treasure in a field the transition is easy—from the finding without seeking to seeking earnestly and finding, easy again: from the seed to the buried treasure, from the treasure to the pearl,—the treasure of the deep,—again simple and natural. The pearl recalls the sea; the sea the fishermen with their net; the mixed throng lining the beach, the great day of separation on the further bank of Time. (2) The seven Parables compose in their inner depth of connexion, a great united whole, beginning with the first sowing of the Church, and ending with the consummation. We must not, as Stier well remarks, seek with Bengel, al., minutely to apportion the series prophetically, to various historical periods: those who have done so (see Trench, p. 142, edn. 4) have shewn caprice and inconsistency; and the parable, though in its manifold depths the light of prophecy sometimes glimmers, has for its main object to teach, not to foretell. More than a general outline, shewn by the prominence of those points to which the respective parables refer, in the successive periods of the Church, we can hardly expect to find. But as much we unquestionably do find. The apostolic age was (1) the greatest of all the seed times of the Church: then (2) sprang up the tares, heresies manifold, and the attempts to root them out, almost as pernicious as the heresies themselves: nay the so-called Church Catholic was for ages employed in rooting up the wheat also. Notwithstanding this (8) the little seed waxed onward—the kingdoms of the earth came gradually in—(4) the leaven was secretly penetrating and assimilating. Then is it, (5) during the period of dissensions, and sects, and denominations, that here and there by this man and that man the treasure shall be found: then is it, (6) during the increase of secular knowledge, and cultivation of the powers of the intellect, that merchantmen shall seek goodly pearls up and down the world, and many shall find, each for himself, the Pearl of Price. And thus we are carried on (7) through all the ages during which the great net has been gathering of every kind, to the solemn day of inspection and separation, which will conclude the present state.

53—58. TEACHING, AND REJECTION, AT NAZARETH. Mark vi. 1—6. See Luke iv. 16—29 and notes. 53, 54.] τὴν πατρίδα, viz. Nazareth. Perhaps the proceedings of ch. viii. 18—ix. 84 are to be inserted between those two verses. In Mark iv. 35, the stilling of the storm and voyage to the Gadarenes are bound to the above parables by what appears a distinct note of sequence: ἐν ἰκτινῇ τῇ ἡμέρᾳ ὁψίας γινόμενης: for we can hardly interpret ὁψ. γεν. on any other hypothesis than that ἐν ἰκ. τ. ἡμ. means 'on the same

55. οἱ ἀδελφοὶ αὐτοῦ] It is an enquiry of much interest and some difficulty, who these were. After long examination of the evidence on the subject, I believe that the truth will best be attained by disencumbering the mind in the first place of all à priori considerations, and traditions (which last are very inconsistent and uncertain), and fixing the attention on the simple testimony of Scripture itself. I will trace the ἀδελφοὶ αὐτοῦ or ἀδ. κυρίου through the various mentions of them in the N. T., and then state the result; placing at the end of the note the principal traditions on the subject, and the difficulties attending them. (1) The expression οἱ ἀδ. αὐτοῦ occurs nine times in the Gospels, and once in the Acts. Of these the three first are in the narratives of the coming of His mother and brethren to speak with Him, Matt. xii. 46 : Mark iii. 31 : Luke viii. 19 : the two next are the present passage and its || in Mark vi. 3, where they are mentioned in connexion with His mother and sisters; the four others are in John ii. 12 ; vii. 3, 5, 10, in the first of which He and his mother and brethren and disciples are related to have gone down to Capernaum : and in the three last His brethren are introduced as urging Him to shew Himself to the world, and it is stated that they did not believe on Him. The last is in Acts i. 14, where we read that the Apostles 'continued in prayer and supplication with the women, and with Mary the mother of Jesus, and with his brethren.' In another place, 1 Cor. ix. 5, Paul mentions οἱ λοιποὶ ἀπόστολοι, καὶ οἱ ἀδ. τ. κυρίου, κ. κηράς. Such are all the places where the meaning is undoubted, that persons called, and being in some usual sense, brethren of the Lord, are mentioned. (Besides these the Lord Himself uses the words οἱ ἀδελφοί μου Matt. xxviii. 10 ; John xv. 12, but apparently with a wider meaning, including at least the eleven Apostles in the term, as He does in Matt. xii. 49 ||.) Now I would observe (α) that in all the mentions of them in the Gospels, except those in John vii., they are in connexion with His mother :

the same being the case in Acts i. 14. (β) That it is no where asserted or implied that any of them were of the number of the twelve; but from John vii. 5, following upon vi. 70 (by μετὰ ταῦτα vii. 1), they are excluded from that number. John would certainly not have used the words οὐδὲ γὰρ οἱ ἀδ. αὐτοῦ. πιστ. ἐς αὐτόν, had any of them believed on Him at that time (see this substantiated in note ad loc.)—and again in Acts i. 14, by being mentioned after the Apostles have been enumerated by name, and after the mother of Jesus, they are indicated at that time also to have been separate from the twelve, although then certainly believing on Him. (γ) Their names, as stated here and in Mark vi. 3, were JACOB, JOSEPH (or JESUS), SIMON, and JUDAS, all of them among the commonest of Jewish names. Of JOSEPH (or JESUS)—certainly not the Joseph Barnabas Justus of Acts i. 23 : see ib. ver. 21) and SIMON (not Simon Cananæus or Zelotes : see above) we know from Scripture nothing. Of the two others we have the following traces—(δ) JACOB (JAMES) appears in the apostolic narrative as ὁ ἀδελφὸς τοῦ κυρίου, Gal. i. 19 : he is there called an apostle. This however determines nothing as to his having been among the twelve (which is a very different matter) ; for Paul and Barnabas are called apostles, Acts xiv. (4) 14, and Paul always calls himself such. See also Rom. xvi. 7 ; 1 Thess. ii. 7 compared with i. 1. That he is identical with the James of Gal. ii. 9, whom Paul mentions with Cephas and John as having given him and Barnabas the right hand of fellowship, fourteen years after the visit in ch. i. 18, does not appear for certain, but has been pretty generally assumed. (See this whole subject discussed in the proleg. to the Epistle of James.) (ε) The JUDE who has left an epistle, and was brother of James, not only does not call himself an apostle, ver. 1 (as neither does James, nor indeed John himself, so that this cannot be urged), but in ver. 17 (see note there) seems to draw a distinction between himself and the Apostles. Whether this indicate that the James and Jude, the authors of the Epistles, were two of these ἀδελφοὶ τ. κυρίου, is uncertain ; but it may at least be mentioned in the course of our enquiry.

I shall now state the result of that enquiry, which has been based on Scripture testimony only. (1) That there were four persons known as oi ἀδ. αὐτοῦ or τ. κυρίου, NOT OF THE NUMBER OF THE TWELVE. (2) That these persons are found in all places (with the above exception) where their names occur in the Gospels, in immediate connexion with Mary, the mother of the Lord. [It is a strange phenomenon in argument, that it should have been maintained by an orthodox writer, that my inference from this proves too much, because Joseph is here introduced as His father : as if a mistake of the Jews with regard to a supernatural fact, which they could not know, invalidated their cognizance of a natural fact which they knew full well.] (3) That not a word is any where dropped to prevent us from inferring that the ἀδελφοὶ and ἀδελφαὶ αὐτοῦ were His relations in the same literal sense as we know ἡ μήτηρ αὐτοῦ to have been ; but that His own saying, where He distinguishes His relations according to the flesh from His disciples (ch. xii. 50 ||), seems to sanction that inference. (4) That nothing is said from which it can be inferred whether Joseph had been married before he appears in the Gospel history ;—or again, whether these ἀδ. were, according to the flesh, older or younger than our Lord. (5) That the silence of the Scripture narrative leaves it free for Christians to believe these to have been real (younger) brethren and sisters of our Lord, without incurring any imputation of unsoundness of belief as to His miraculous conception. That such an imputation has been cast, is no credit to the logical correctness of those who have made it, who set down that, because this view has been taken by impugnors of the great Truth just mentioned, therefore it eventually leads, or may fairly be used, towards the denial of it (see Dr. Mill on the Brethren of our Lord, p. 224) ; for no attempt is made to shew its connexion with such a conclusion. The fact is, that the two matters, the miraculous conception of the Lord Jesus by the Holy Ghost, and the subsequent virginity of His Mother, are ESSENTIALLY AND ENTIRELY DISTINCT ; see note on Matt. i. 25 : see also, respecting a supposed difficulty attending this view, note on John xix. 27. (11) I will now state the principal traditional views respecting the brethren of the Lord. (1) That they were all sons of Alphæus (or Clopas) and Mary the sister of the mother of our Lord ; and so cousins of Jesus, and called agreeably to Jewish usage His brothers. This is the view taken in the remarkable fragment of Papias, quoted in Dr. Mill, p. 238, adopted by Jerome (cont. Helvidium), and very generally received in ancient and modern times. But it seems to me that a comparison of the Scripture testimonies cited above will prove it untenable. One at least of the sons of this Alphæus was an apostle, of the number of the twelve, viz. Ἰακώβος ὁ τοῦ Ἀλφαίου (see all the lists, on ch. x. 8) ; which (see above) would exclude him from the number of the brethren of the Lord. But even if one of the four could be thus detached (which, from John vii. 5, I cannot believe), it is generally assumed that Ἰούδας Ἰακώβου (see Luke's two lists as above) is Jude the brother of James ; and if so, this would be another son of Alphæus, and another subtraction from the number who did not believe on Him. Again Matthew (see note on Matt. ix. 9), if identical with Levi (Mark ii. 14), was another son of Alphæus ; which would make a fifth brother, and leave therefore, out of five, three believing on Him at the time when it was said οὐδὲ γὰρ οἱ ἀδ. . . κ.τ.λ. This view besides labours under the difficulty arising from these brethren accompanying and being found in connexion with Mary the mother of our Lord, whereas throughout that time their own mother was living. The way in which the assertors of this view explain John vii. 5, is either by supposing that all the brethren are not there implied, or that all are not here mentioned ; both suppositions, it seems to me, very unlikely (compare e. g. John's minute accuracy where an exception was to be made, ch. vi. 23, 24). (2) That they were children of Joseph by a former marriage (or even by a later one with Mary wife of Clopas, to raise up seed to his dead brother,—as Clopas is said to have been : but this needs no refutation). This view was taken by several early Fathers, e. g. Hilary, Epiphanus, and mentioned by Origen, who (Winer, Realwörterbuch, i. p. 663) says respecting it, οι ταυτα ληγοντας το αξιομα της Μαρίας εν παρθενία τηρειν μιχρη τι- λους βουλονται. This however, while by no means impossible, and in some respects agreeing with the apparent position of these brothers as older (according to the flesh) than the Lord (John vii. 3), has no coun- tenance whatever in Scripture, either in their being called sons of any other woman, or in any distinct mention of Joseph as their father, which surely in this case would be required. (III) On the à priori con- siderations which have influenced opinions on this matter, see note on Matt. i. 25; and on the traditional literature, see the tract of Professor Mill on the Brethren of our Lord. See also Winer, Realwörterbuch, Art. Jesus, § 3. Greswell, Dissertations, vol. ii. Diss. iii. Blom, Disputatio Theo- logica de r. dō. r. z. Lug. Bat. 1839. This letter is too much based on à priori considerations, but con- tains some valuable suggestions on this con- fessedly difficult question.

Neander, Leben J. p. 48, brings out the importance of the view which I have above, under (I), endeavoured to justify, as shewing that the account of the miraculous conception is not mythical, in which case all would have been arranged to suit the views of virginity from which it had arisen,—but strictly histori- cal, found as it is with no such arrange- ments or limitations.

CHAP. XIV. 1—12.] HEROD HEARS OF THE FAME OF JESUS. PARENTHETICAL ACCOUNT OF THE DEATH OF JOHN THE BAPTIST. Mark vi. 14—29. Luke ix. 7 —9, who does not relate the death of John.

1.] This Herod was Herod ANTIPAS, son of Herod the Great, ἱς Μαλ- θάκης της Σαμαρειτιδος, and own brother of Archelaus (Jos. B. J. i. 28. 4). The portion of the kingdom allotted to him by the second will of his father (in the first he was left as king) was the tetrarchy of Galilee and Peræa (Jos. Antt. xvii. 8. 1). He married the daughter of the Arabian king Aretas; but having during a visit to his half-brother Herod Philip (not the tetrarch of that name, but another son of Herod the Great, disinherited by his father) be- come enamoured of his wife Herodias, he prevailed on her to leave her husband, and live with him. (See below, on ver. 4.) This step, accompanied as it was with a stipulation of putting away the daughter of Aretas, involved him in a war with his father-in-law, which however did not break out till a year before the death of Tiberius (A.D. 37, v.c. 790; Jos. Antt. xviii. 5. 1—8), and in which he was totally defeated and his army destroyed by Aretas; a divine vengeance, according to the Jews, for the death of John the Baptist (Josephus, ibid.). He and Herodias afterwards went to Rome at the beginning of Caligula's reign, to complain of the assumption of the title of king by Agrippa his nephew, son of Aristobulus; but Caligula having heard the claims of both, banished Antipas and Herodias to Lyons in Gaul, whence he was afterwards removed to Spain, and there died: Jos. Antt. xviii. 7. 1, 2. The fol- lowing events apparently took place at Ma- chærus, a frontier fortress between Peræa and Arabia: see below on ver. 10.

preaching and miracles of the twelve, on their mission, of which Herod heard,—probably in conjunction with the works of Christ: see || Mark. 2.] waïs = δούλος. αὐτός [emphatic; equivalent in English to "it is he, that" . . . In Luke ix. 7 it is said that Herod διηπόρει διὰ τὸ λίγισθαι ὑπὸ τινων τοῦ Ἰωάν. ἐγγ. κ.τ.λ. There is no inconsistency in these accounts: the report originated with others: but if Herod διηπόρει concerning it, he, in the terrors of a guilty conscience, doubtless gave utterance to these words himself. There is no evidence that Herod was a Sadducee, or a disbeliever in the resurrection as then held by the Pharisees. See also note on Mark viii. 14. There is no allusion here to metempsychosis, but to the veritable bodily resurrection, and supposed greater power acquired by having passed through death. This is an incidental confirmation of John x. 41, where we read that John wrought no miracle while living. 4.] The marriage was unlawful for these three reasons: (1)

The former husband of Herodias, Philip, was still living. This is expressly asserted by Josephus, Antt. xviii. 5. 4. Ἡρωδιάς, ἐκ συγχύσεως φρονήσασα τῶν πατριῶν, Ἡρώδῃ γαμήσκει τοῦ ἀνδρός τῷ ὁμωπατριῷ ἀδελφῷ, διαστᾶσα ζῶντος. (A reply to the attempt made by some to interpret these last words, 'having previously been divorced from him while living,' is hardly needed, in the presence of the two unqualified synchronous participles, φρονήσασα and διανοῶσα. Besides, the part. is not ἀποστᾶσα, as erroneously quoted by the Bp. of Exeter: see his published speech of Feb. 25, 1851, note.) The same is surely implied by the whole narrative, and the word μετοικισσασθαι, Antt. xviii. 5. 1. (2) The former wife of Antipas was still living, and fled to her father Aretas on hearing of his intention to marry Herodias: Jos. ibid. (3) Antipas and Herodias were already related to one another within the forbidden degrees of consanguinity. For θυγάτηρ ἦν Ἀριστοβοῦλου, καὶ οὗτος ἀδελφός αὐτῶν (of Antipas and Philip), Jos. ib. See the Bp.'s note, and a reply to it in substance the same as the foregoing, in the Quarterly Journal of Sacred Lit. for Oct. 1852 and Jan. 1853. I may add that the remark of Josephus (Antt. xviii. 5. 4), that Salome's birth had taken place previously to the infidelity of Herodias, is not given, as understood by the Bp. (after Tertullian, adv. Marcion. iv. 34, p. 443 ed. Migne), as the technical reason why her conduct was καὶ συγχύσεως τῶν πατριῶν, but as a moral aggravation of her unnatural crime. It was unlawful by Levit. xviii. 16. 5.] This verse is further expanded in Mark: ὁ γὰρ Ἡρ. ἐφοβήτο τὸν Ἰω. εἰδὼς αὐτὸν ἀνδρα δίκαιον καὶ ἄγιον, καὶ συνεγέρει αὐτόν, καὶ ἀκούσας αὐτοῦ πολλὰ ἱκοίσι, καὶ ἡδῶς αὐτοῦ ἤκουεν. Josephus, not being aware of any other grounds for his imprisonment, alleges purely political ones: διότις Ἡρώδης τὸ ἐπὶ τοσούτοις πιθανὸν αὐτοῦ τοῖς ἀνθρώποις μὴ ἐπὶ ἀποστάσει τιμὴ φέροι . . . πολλὸ κρείττον ἡγίεται, πρὶν τι νώτερον ἐξ αὐτοῦ γενέσθαι, προλαβὼν ἀναίριν . . . Anth. xviii. 5. 2. εἶχον] literally, 'possederunt eum tanquam prophetam'; and thus Meyer maintains it must be rendered: but as our 'hold,' so εἶχον comes to be applied to the estimate formed of a man or thing, which subjectively is our possession of him or it.

8. γενεσίαις] the birthday. This name was given in classical Greek to an anniversary celebration of the memory of the dead. So Herod., iv. 26, having described such a celebration among the Isaeodones, adds, καὶς δὲ παρὶ τοῦτο ποιεῖ κατὰ τὴν οἰ "Ελληνικὴν τὰ γενέσια. Phrynichus, Hesych., and Ammonius lay it down that γενέσια is not to be used for γενέθλια, a birthday. But the adj. was certainly so used in later Greek: e. g. ἀγοντες τ. γενέσιον ἡμέραν τ. παιδίου,

Jos. Antt. xii. 4. 7 (in Dio Cassius xlvii. 18, lvi. 46, lxxvi. 2, usually cited, the γενέσια, though bearing this meaning, are in each case in honour of a dead person). See Suicer, Thes. under γενέθλια, and Lobeck's note, Phryn. p. 103. Heins., Grot., al., hold that the word here means the feast of Herod's accession: but they give no proof that it ever had such a meaning. Among the seasons kept by the Gentiles, enumerated in the rabbinical work Avoda Sara, we have עֲוֹלָה לְטַמְּוּת: see Lightfoot in loc.

A great feast was given to the nobility of Galilee, Mark vi. 21. The damsel's name was Salome (Jos. Antt. xviii. 5. 4), daughter of Herodias by her former husband Philip. She afterwards married her uncle Philip, tetrarch of Ituræa and Trachonitis: and he dying childless, she became the wife of her cousin Aristobulus son of Herod king of Chalcis, by whom she had three sons, Herod, Agrippa, and Aristobulus. The dance was probably a pantomimic dance.

9.] ὁ βασιλεὺς was a title which Herod never properly possessed. Subsequently to this event, Herodias prevailed on him to go to Rome to get the title, which had been granted to his nephew Agrippa. He was opposed by the emissaries of Agrippa, and was exiled to Lugdunum. See note on ver.

1, and Josephus there cited. Herod was grieved because he heard John gladly (Mark vi. 20), and from policy did not wish to put him to death on so slight a cause. This is not inconsistent with his wishing to put him to death : his estimate of John was wavering and undecided, and he was annoyed at the decision being taken out of his hands by a demand, compliance with which would be irrevocable.

10.] It appears from the damsel's expression δός μοι ὠδε and this verse, that the feast was held either at Machærus or at no great distance from it. Antipas had a palace near, τὰ πλῆσιον Ἰορδάνου βασιλεία κατὰ Βηθαράμαθον, B. J. ii. 4. 2; but he was not there on account of the war with Aretas, — see above.

13—21.] FEEDING OF THE FIVE THOUSAND. Mark vi. 30—44. Luke ix. 10—17. John vi. 1—13, where also see notes.

13.] There is some difficulty here in conceiving how the narration is to proceed continuously. The death of the Baptist is evidently retrospectively and parenthetically inserted; and yet the retirement of our Lord in this verse seems to be the immediate consequence of his hearing of that occurrence. But this may well have been so : for (1) the disciples of John would be some days in bringing the news from Machærus to Capernaum, and the report mentioned in ver. 1 might reach Herod meantime; (2) the expression with which that report is introduced, ἐν ἑσπέρῃ τῇ καιρῷ, extends it over a considerable space of time; and (3) the message which the disciples of John brought to our Lord might have included both particulars, the death of their Master, and the saying of Herod respecting Himself. He went across the lake (John vi. 1) into a desert place belonging to the city called Bethsaida (Luke ix. 10). His retirement (Luke, ibid., and Mark vi. 30) was connected also with the return of the twelve from their mission : compare the full and affecting account of the whole transaction in Mark vi. 30—35.

miracle was late in the night. ἡ ὥρα] the time of the day is now late, ἡν τῆς ὥρας μισρὸν πρὸ δύντος ἡλίου, Xen. Hell. vii. 2. 22. 18. 17.] δότε αὐτοῖς ἑμαῖς φ., which is common to the three first Evangelists, is considerably expanded in the more detailed account of John, ver. 3—7 ; it was Andrew who spoke in ver. 17, and the five loaves and two fishes were brought by a lad : John vi. 8, 9. They were barley loaves and (salt) fish ; ibid. And we have (perhaps, but see note there) the vast concourse accounted for in John by the fact that the Passover was at hand, and so they were collected on their journey to Jerusalem. See a very similar miracle in 2 Kings iv. 42—44 ; only then there were twenty barley loaves and an hundred men. See also Numbers xi. 21, 22.

19. ἠυλόγησεν] Luke supplies αὐτούς, the loaves and fishes : John has for it εὐχαριστήσας. Both are one. The thanks to heaven is the blessing on the meat. ὁ Σωτὴρ πρῶτον ἀνιβλεψεν εἰς τὸν οὐρανὸν ταῖς ἀετίαι τῶν ὀφθαλμῶν αὐτοῦ οἰονεῖ καταβιβάζων δύναμιν ἐκείθιν τὴν ἀνοκραθησομένην τοῖς ἄρτοις καὶ τοῖς ἰχθύσι μύλλουσι τρίφειν τοὺς πεντακισ-χιλίους, καὶ μετὰ τοῦτο ἠυλόγησε τ. π. ἄρτους κ. τ. δ. ἰχθ., τῷ λόγῳ κ. τῇ εὐλογίᾳ αὐξῶν κ. πληθύνων αὐτούς. Orig. in loc. This miracle was one of symbolic meaning for the twelve, who had just returned from their mission, as pointing to the δωρεὰν ἐλάβετε, δωρεὰν δότε of ch. x. 8 in a higher sense than they then could have understood it :—but see the symbolic import of the miracle treated in the notes to John vi.

Meyer well remarks that the process of the miracle is thus to be conceived :—the Lord blessed, and gave the loaves and fishes to the disciples, as they were ; and then, during their distribution of them, the miraculous increase took place, so that

The coφίνους was the usual accompaniment of the Jew: see Juv. Sat. iii. 14—'Judæis, quorum coφinus fœnumque supplex'; and Sat. vi. 542. For this reason he constrained His disciples to leave Him, because they were but too anxious to second this wish of the multitude; and their dismissal was therefore an important step towards the other.

33.] These persons were probably the crew of the ship, and distinct from the disciples. On θεοῦ υἱός, see note, ch. iv. 3. It is the first time that our Lord is called so by men in the three synoptic Gospels. See ch. iii. 17; iv. 3; viii. 29; and John i. 34, 50. This feeling of amazement and reverence pervaded the disciples also: see the strong expressions of Mark vi. 52.

34—36.] Mark vi. 53—56. Gennesaret, a district from which the lake was also occasionally so called, extended along its western shore. See Josephus's glowing description of the beauty and fertility of this plain, B. J. iii. 10. 7. At its northern end was Capernaum, near which our Lord landed, as would appear from John vi. 24, 25.

CHAP. XV. 1—20.] DISCOURSE CONCERNING EATING WITH UNWASHED HANDS. Mark vii. 1—23. From Mark it appears that these Scribes and Pharisees had come expressly from Jerusalem to watch our Lord: most probably after that Passover which was nigh at the time of feeding the five thousand, John vi. 4.

2.] The Jews attached more importance to the traditionary exposition than to the Scripture text itself. They compared the written word to water; the traditionary exposition to the wine which must be mingled with it.

The duty of washing before meat is not inculcated in the law, but only in the traditions of the Scribes. So rigidly did the Jews observe it, that Rabbi Akiba, being imprisoned, and having water scarcely sufficient to sustain life given him, preferred dying of thirst to eating without washing his hands.

bind the utterer to consecrate his prop-

which this citation is made (ch. xxiv.—

nominal Israel, and the salvation of the true Israel of God. And, as so often in the prophetic word, its threats and promises are for all times of the Church;— the particular event then foretold being but one fulfilment of those deeper and more general declarations of God, which shall be ever having their successive illus-

prophecy is nearly according to the LXX, which compare. The citation in Mark is (if the spurious words in the rec. here be tude in ver. 11. 13.] The plant is the teaching of the Pharisees, altogether of human, and not of divine planting. That this is so, is clear by ἀφετε αὐτούς following, and by the analogy of our Lord's parabolic symbolism, in which seed, plant, &c., are compared to doctrine, which however in its growth becomes identified with, and impersonated by, its recipients and disseminators. See this illustrated in notes on the parable of the sower, ch. xiii. 'φωτόν, natural: φωρία, cura. Bengel. On this verse see John xv. 1, 2. 15.] The saying in ver. 11, which is clearly the subject of the question, was not strictly a παραβολή, but a plain declaration; so that either Peter took it for a parable,—or παραβ. must be taken in its wider sense of 'an hard saying.' Stier thinks that their questioning as to the meaning of parables in ch. xiii. had habituated them to asking for explanations in this form.

16.] The saying in ver. 11 was spoken for the multitude, who were exhorted ἀκούετε κ. συνίετε: much more then ought the disciples to have understood it.

ἀκμὴν = adhuc is a later Greek word: Phrynichus (p. 123, ed. Lo-beck) says that Xenophon uses it once (ref.): but this is not in the sense of et, but ante, 'even now,' 'in articulo,' see Lo-beck's note, where he gives more examples.

21—23.] THE CANAANITISH WOMAN. Mark vii. 24—30: omitted by Luke. It is not quite clear whether our Lord actually passed the frontier into the land of the heathen, or merely was on the frontier. The usage of εἰς τὰ μέρη in Matthew favours the former supposition: see ch. ii. 22; xvi. 13; also for ὅρια, ch. ii. 16; iv. 13; viii. 34. Exod. xvi. 35, εἰς μίρος τῆς Φοινίκης, 'to the borders of Canaan,' has been quoted as supporting the other view; but the usage of our Evangelist himself seems to carry greater weight. And the question is not one of importance; for our Lord did not go to teach or to heal, but, as it would appear, to avoid the present indignation of the Pharisees. Mark's tain to which side of the lake our Lord came; from Mark vii. 31 we learn that it was to the eastern side, ἀνὰ μίσην τῶν ὁρίων Δεσαπόλειος.

30.] κυλλοὶ are persons maimed in the hands; see Jerome in var. readl. (But it is also used of the feet, τὶ δεῦρο πόδα σὺ κυλλῶν ἀνὰ κύκλον κυκλίης; Aristoph. Av. 1379.) The meaning need not be, that a wanting member was supplied to these persons; but that a debility, such as that arising from paralysis or wound, was healed.

ἐφθίμην, not in neglect, but from haste and rivalry. 31.] Mark (vii. 32—37) gives an instance of κωφοὺς λαλοῦντας.

τὸν θ. Ἰσραήλ] Perhaps this last word is added as an expression of the joy of the disciples themselves, who contrasted the fulness and abundance of the acts of mercy now before them with the instance which they had just seen of the difficulty with which the faith of a Gentile had prevailed to obtain help.

32.] The modern German interpreters assume the identity of this miracle with that narrated in ch. xiv. 14 ff. If this be so, then our Evangelists must have forged the speech attributed to our Lord in ch. xvi. 9, 10. But, as Ebrard justly remarks (Evangelien-kritik, p. 532), every circumstance which could vary, does vary, in the two accounts. The situation in the wilderness, the kind of food at hand, the blessing and breaking, and distributing by means of the disciples, these are common to the two accounts, and were likely to be so: but here the matter is introduced by our Lord Himself with an expression of pity for the multitudes who had continued with Him three days: here also the provision is greater, the numbers are less than on the former occasion. But there is one small token of authenticity which marks these two accounts as referring to two distinct events, even had we not such direct testimony as that of ch. xvi. 9, 10. It is, that whereas the baskets in which the fragments were collected on the other occasion are called by all four Evangelists κόφινος, those used for that purpose after this miracle are in both Matt. and Mark στυβίβες. And when our Lord refers to the two miracles, the same distinction is observed; a particularity which could not have arisen except as pointing to a matter of fact, that, whatever the distinction be, which is uncertain, different kinds of baskets were used on the two occasions. Perhaps the strangest reason for supposing the two identical (given by De Wette, Schleiermacher, and others) is an imagined difficulty in the question of the disciples, πόθεν ἡμῖν κ.τ.λ., so soon after the former miracle; as if the same slowness to believe and trust in divine power were not repeatedly found among men, and instanced in Scripture itself;—compare Exod. xvi. 13 with Num. xi. 21, 22; and read in Exod. xvii. 1—7 the murmurings of the Israelites immediately after their deliverance at the Red Sea. And even could we recognize this as a difficulty, it is not necessarily implied in the text. Our Lord puts the matter to them as a question, without the slightest intimation of His intention to supply the want supernaturally. They make answer in the same spirit, without venturing (as indeed it would have been most unbecoming in them to do, see John ii. 3, 4) to suggest the working of a miracle. De Wette's assumption that the usage of κόφινος and στυβίβες shews two different traditional sources used by the author, would make it necessary to suppose that the forger of ch. xvi. 9, 10 has been skilful enough to preserve this distinction; an accuracy seldom found in interpolations of early Christian Dalmanutha, mentioned by Mark (viii. 10), seems to have been a village in the neighbourhood.

CHAP. XVI. 1—4. REQUEST FOR A SIGN FROM HEAVEN. Mark viii. 11—13, but much abridged. See also Luke xii. 54 and notes. 1. σημεῖον ἐκ τοῦ οὐρανοῦ] see notes at ch. xii. 38. There is no ground for supposing that this narrative refers to the same event as that. What can be more natural than that the adversaries of our Lord should have met His miracles again and again with this demand of a sign from heaven? For in the Jewish superstition it was held that demons and false gods could give signs on earth, but only the true God signs from heaven. In the apocryphal Epistle of Jeremiah, ver. 67, we read of the gods of the heathen, σημεῖά τε ἐν ἰθυσιν ἐν οὐρανῷ οὐ μὴ δεῖξωσιν . . . And for such a notion they alleged the bread from heaven given by Moses (see John vi. 31), the staying of the sun by Joshua (Josh. x. 12), the thunder and rain by Samuel (1 Sam. xii. 17, compare Jer. xiv. 22), and Elijah (James v. 17, 18). And thus we find that immediately after the first miraculous feeding the same demand was made, John vi. 30, and answered by the declaration of our Lord that He was the true bread from heaven. And what more natural likewise, than that our Lord should have uniformly met the demand by the same answer,—the sign of Jonas, one so calculated to baffle his enemies and hereafter to fix the attention of His disciples? Here however that answer is accompanied by other rebukes sufficiently distinctive. It was now probably the evening (see Mark viii. 10, εὐθές;) and our Lord was looking on the glow in the west which suggested the remark in ver. 2. On the practice of the Jews to demand a sign, see 1 Cor. i. 22. 2.] Mark viii. 12 adds καὶ ἀναστεινάζας τῇ πνεύματι αὐτοῦ . . ., omitting however the sentences following. The Jews were much given to prognosticating the rains, &c. of the coming season in each year. See Lightf. who cites examples. 3.] Polybius iv. 21. 1, speaks of the ἡθῶν αὐστηρίαν (of the Arcadians) ἥτις αὐτοῖς παρῖεται διὰ τὴν τοῦ περιέχοντος (ἀέρος) ψυχρότητα καὶ συγγρότητα. 'Si circa occidentem rubescunt nubes, serenitatem futuræ diei spondent; concavus oriens pluvias prædicit; idem ventos cum ante exorientem eum nubes rubescunt: quod si et nigrae rubentibus intervenerint (πυρῥάζει συγνάζων) et pluvias.' 5-12.] WARNING AGAINST THE LEAVEN OF THE PHARISEES AND SADDUCEES. Mark viii. 13-21. 5.] This crossing of the lake was not the voyage to Magadan mentioned in ch. xv. 39, for after the dialogue with the Pharisees, Mark adds (viii. 13), πάλιν ἰμβάζει ἀπῆλθεν εἰς τὸ πέραν. ἐπελάθ.] not for a pluperfect: After they had come to the other side, they forgot to take bread; viz. on their land journey further. This is also to be understood in Mark (viii. 14), who states their having only one loaf in the ship, not to shew that they had forgotten to take bread before starting, but as a reason why they should have provided some on landing. 6. τῆς ζύμης] See beginning of note on ch. xiii. 33. It is from the penetrating and diffusive power of leaven that the comparison, whether for good or bad, is derived. In Luke

xii. 1, where the warning is given on a wholly different occasion, the leaven is explained to mean, hypocrisy; which is of all evil things the most penetrating and diffusive, and is the charge which our Lord most frequently brings against the Jewish sects. In Mark we read, καὶ τῆς ζύμης Ἠρώδου. The Herodians were more a political than a religious sect, the dependants and supporters of the dynasty of Herod, for the most part Sadducees in religious sentiment. These, though directly opposed to the Pharisees, were yet united with them in their persecution of our Lord, see ch. xxii. 16; Mark iii. 6. And their leaven was the same,—hypocrisy,—however it might be disguised by external difference of sentiment. They were all unbelievers at heart. 7.] ἐν ἑαυτοῖς = πρὸς ἀλλήλους Mark viii. 16. . 13—20.] CONFESSION OF PETER. Mark viii. 27—30. Luke ix. 18—21. Here St. Luke rejoins the synoptic narrative, having left it at ch. xiv. 22. We here begin the second great division of our Saviour's ministry on earth, introductory to His sufferings and death. Up to this time we have had no distinct intimation, like that in ver. 21, of these events. This intimation is brought in by the solemn question and confession now before us. And as the former period of His ministry was begun by a declaration from the Father of His Sonship, so this also, on the Mount of Transfiguration. ¹³ Καισαρείας τῆς Φ.] A town in Gaulonitis at the foot of Mount Libanus, not far from the source of the Jordan, a day's journey from Sidon, once called Laish (Judg. xviii. 7, 29) and afterwards Dan (ibid.), but in later times Paneas, or Panias, from the mountain Panium, under which it lay (Joseph. Antt. xv. 10. 3. Φιλίππου Καισαρείας, ἢ Πανιάδα Φοινικεῖς προσγοροῦσιν, Euseb. H. E. vii. 17). The tetrarch Philip enlarged it and gave it the name of Caesarea (Joseph. Antt. xviii. 2. 1). In after times King Agrippa further enlarged it and called it Neronias in honour of the emperor Nero (Jos. Antt. xx. 9. 4). This must not be confounded with the Caesarea of the Acts, which was Caesarea Stratonis, on the Mediterranean. See Acts x. 1, and note. The following enquiry took place in τῇ ὁδῷ, Mark viii. 27. St. Luke gives it without note of place, but states it to have been asked on the disciples joining our Lord, who was praying alone, Luke ix. 18.

τίνα λεγουσιν] who do men say that the Son of Man is? τὸν υἱὸν τοῦ ἀνθρ. being equivalent to με in the corresponding sentence below, ver. 15. Of those who read με in the text, some would render as if our Lord had said, 'Who say men that I am? the Son of Man?' i. e. the Messiah? (Beza, Le Clerc, and others,) but this is inadmissible, for the answer would not then have been expressed as it is, but affirmatively or negatively. Equally inadmissible is Olshausen's rendering ἐμὲ τὸν υἱὸν τοῦ ἀνθ. (ὡς οἶδαν) εἶπα. 'Me, who am, as ye are aware, the Son of Man?' an expression, Olshausen says, by which the disciples would be led to the idea of the Son of God. But then this would destroy the simplicity of the following question, But who say ye that I am? because it would put into their mouths the answer intended to be given. The E. V. has beyond doubt the right rendering of this reading: and τὸν υἱ. τ. ἀνθ. is a pregnant expression, which we now know to imply the Messiahship in the root of our human nature, and which even then was taken by the Jews as = the Son of God, (see Luke xxii. 69, 70,) which would serve as a test of the faith of the disciples, according to their understanding of it. οἱ ἄνθρωποι (generic: = οἱ ὄχλοι in Luke), i. e. the οἶμα of ver. 17, the human opinion.

that some called him the Son of David (ch. ix. 27; xii. 23; xv. 22); for either these were or were about to become His disciples, or are quoted as examples of rare faith, or as in ch. xii. 23, it was the passing doubt on the minds of the multitude, not their settled opinion. The same may be said of John vii. 26, 31; iv. 42. On our Lord's being taken for John the Baptist, see ch. xiv. 2, from which this would appear to be the opinion of the Herodians. ἓνα τῶν προφ. = ὅτι προφ. τις τῶν ἀρχαίων ἀνίστη, Luke ix. 19. It was not a metempsychosis, but a bodily resurrection which was believed. On Ἠλίαν, see note at ch. xi. 14. Jeremiah was accounted by the Jews the first in the prophetic canon (Lightfoot on Matt. xxvii. 9).

16.] τί εἶπεν τὸ στόμα τῶν ἀποστόλων ὁ Πέτρος, ὁ πανταχοῦ θερμός, ὁ τοῦ χοροῦ τῶν ἀποστόλων κορυφαίος; πάντων ἱρωτηθέντων αὐτὸς ἀποκρίνεται, Chrysost. Hom. liv. p. 546. The confession is not made in the terms of the other answer: it is not 'we say' or 'I say,' but Thou art. It is the expression of an inward conviction wrought by God's Spirit. The excellence of this confession is, that it brings out both the human and the divine nature of the Lord: ὁ χριστός is the Messiah, the Son of David, the anointed King: ὁ υἱὸς τοῦ θεοῦ τοῦ ζῶντος is the Eternal Son, begotten of the Eternal Father, not 'Son of God' in any inferior figurative sense, not one of the sons of God, of angelic nature, but THE SON OF THE LIVING GOD, having in Him the Sonship and the divine nature in a sense in which they could be in none else. This was a view of the Person of Christ quite distinct from the Jewish Messianic idea, which appears to have been (Justin Mart. Dial. § 48, p. 144) that he should be a man born from men, but selected by God for the office on account of his eminent virtues. This distinction accounts for the solemn blessing pronounced in the next verse. τοῦ ζῶντος must not for a moment be taken here as it sometimes is used, (e. g. ref. Acts.) as merely distinguishing the true God from dead idols: it is here emphatic, and imparts force and precision to υἱός. That Peter, when he uttered the words, understood by them in detail all that we now understand, is not of course here asserted: but that they were his testimony to the true Humanity and true Divinity of the Lord, in that sense of deep truth and reliance, out of which springs the Christian life of the Church.

17. μακάριος] as in ch. v. 4, &c., is a solemn expression of blessing, an inclusion of him to whom it is addressed in the kingdom of heaven, not a mere word of praise. And the reason of it is, the fact that the Father had revealed the Son to him (see ch. xi. 25—27); cf. Gal. i. 15, 16, in which passage the occurrence of σαρκὶ καὶ αἵματι seems to indicate a reference to this very saying of the Lord. The whole declaration of St. Paul in that chapter forms a remarkable parallel to the character and promise given to St. Peter in our text,—as establishing Paul's claim to be another such πίτρα or στέλος as Peter and the other great Apostles, because the Son had been revealed in him not of man nor by men, but by God Himself. The name Simon Bar Jonas is doubtless used as indicating his fleshly state and extraction, and forming the greater contrast to his spiritual state, name, and blessing, which follow. The same 'Simon son of Jonas' is uttered when he is reminded by the thrice repeated enquiry,

'Lovest thou me?' of his frailty, in his previous denial of his Lord. 18.] The name Πέτρος (not now first given, but prophetically bestowed by our Lord on His first interview with Simon, John i. 43) or Κηφῆς, signifying a rock, the termination being only altered to suit the masculine appellation, denotes the personal position of this Apostle in the building of the Church of Christ. He was the first of those foundation-stones (Rev. xxi. 14) on which the living temple of God was built: this building itself beginning on the day of Pentecost by the laying of three thousand living stones on this very foundation. That this is the simple and only interpretation of the words of our Lord, the whole usage of the New Testament shews: in which not doctrines nor confessions, but men, are uniformly the pillars and stones of the spiritual building. See 1 Pet. ii. 4—6; 1 Tim. iii. 15 (where the pillar is not Timotheus, but the congregation of the faithful) and note: Gal. ii. 9: Eph. ii. 20: Rev. iii. 12. And it is on Peter, as by divine revelation making this confession, as thus under the influence of the Holy Ghost, as standing out before the Apostles in the strength of this faith, as himself founded on the one foundation, Ἰησοῦς χριστός, 1 Cor. iii. 11—that the Jewish portion of the Church was built, Acts ii.—v., and the Gentile, Acts x., xi. After this we hear little of him; but during this, the first building time, he is never lost sight of: see especially Acts i. 15; ii. 14, 37; iii. 12; iv. 8; v. 15, 29; ix. 34, 40; x. 25, 26. We may certainly exclaim with Bengel (Gnomon, p. 117) 'Tute hæc omnia dicuntur; nam quid hæc ad Romanam?' Nothing can be further from any legitimate interpretation of this promise, than the idea of a perpetual primacy in the successors of Peter; the very notion of succession is precluded by the form of the comparison, which concerns the person, and him only, so far as it involves a direct promise. In its other and general sense, as applying to all those living stones (Peter's own expression for members of Christ's Church) of whom the Church should be built, it implies, as

Origen (in Matth. tom. xii. 11, p. 525) excellently comments on it, καὶ εἰ τις λέγει τοῦτο πρὸς αὐτόν, οὐ σαρκεὶς καὶ αἵματος ἀποκαλυφάντων αὐτῷ, ἀλλὰ τοῦ ἐν τοῖς οὐρανοῖς πατρός, τεύχεται τῶν εἰρημίνων, ὥς μὲν τὸ γράμμα τοῦ ἐθαγγελίου λέγει, πρὸς ἑκείνον τὸν Πέτρον, ὥς δὲ τὸ πνεῦμα αὐτοῦ διδάσκει, πρὸς πάντα τὸν γεγόμενον ὁποῖος ὁ Πέτρος ἑκείνος. The application of the promise to St. Peter has been elaborately impugned by Wordsw., whose note see. His zeal to appropriate πίτρα to Christ has somewhat overshot itself. In arguing that the term can apply to none but God, he will find it difficult surely to deny all reference to a rock in the name Πέτρος. To me, it is equally difficult, nay impossible, to deny all reference, in ἐπὶ ταύτῃ τῇ πέτρᾳ, to the preceding πίτρας. Let us keep to the plain straightforward sense of Scripture, however that sense may have been misused by Rome. In this as in so many other cases we may well say, 'Non tall auxilio, nec defensoribus istis.' In the prefixing of μου to τὴν ἐκκλησίαν, there is no mystic sense, nor solecism, as Wordsw. fancies (nor even emphasis, which is never expressed by the abbreviated enclitic form μου, but always by ἐμοῦ): it is the very commonest arrangement. Cf. ch. vii. 24, ὅστις ἀκούει μου τ. λόγους; ib. 26; ch. viii. 8; xvii. 15; Mark xiv. 8; Luke vi. 47; xii. 18 al. freq. ἐκκλησίαν] This word occurs but in one place besides in the Gospels, ch. xviii. 17 bis, and there in the same sense as here, viz., the congregation of the faithful: only there it is one portion of that congregation, here the whole. πύλαι ᾧδου] The gates of Hades by a well-known oriental form of speech, = the power of the kingdom of death. The form is still preserved when the Turkish empire is known as 'the Ottoman Porte.' This promise received a remarkable literal fulfilment in the person of Peter in Acts xii. 6—18, see especially ver. 10. The meaning of the promise is, that over the Church so built upon him who was by the strength of that confession the Rock, no adverse power should ever prevail to extinguish it. 19.] Another personal promise to various classes of members of the Sanhedrim: see note on ch. ii. 4. On the prophesy of the resurrection, some have objected that the disciples and friends of our Lord appear not to have expected it (see John xx. 2; Luke xxiv. 12). But we have it directly asserted (Mark ix. 10 and 32)

that they did not understand the saying, and therefore were not likely to make it a ground of expectation. Certainly enough was known of such a prophecy to make the Jews set a watch over the grave (Matt.
xxvii. 63), which of itself answers the objection. Meyer in loc. reasons about the state of the disciples after the crucifixion just as if they had not suffered any remarkable overthrow of their hopes and reliances, and maintains that they must have remembered this precise prophecy if it had been given by the Lord. But on the other hand we must remember how slow despondency is to take up hope, and how many of the Lord's sayings must have been completely veiled from their eyes, owing to their non-apprehension of His sufferings and triumph as a whole.
He Himself reproaches them with this very slowness of belief after His resurrection. It is in the highest degree improbable that the precision should have been given to this prophecy after the event, as Meyer supposes: both from the character of the Gospel History in general (see Pro-legomena), and because of the carefulness and precision in the words added by Mark; see above. 22.] The same Peter, who

but just now had made so noble and spiritual a confession, and received so high a blessing, now shews the weak and carnal side of his character, becomes a stumbling-block in the way of his Lord, and earns the very rebuff with which the Tempter before him had been dismissed. Nor is there any thing improbable in this, as Schleiermacher would have us believe (Translation of the Essay on St. Luke, p. 153); the expression of spiritual faith may, and frequently does, precede the betraying of carnal weakness; and never is this more probable than when the mind has just been uplifted, as Peter's was, by commendation and lofty promise.

a dative is practically equivalent to the He-

the LXX have sometimes used it.

οὐ μὴ ἔσται.] I cannot think with Winer (§ 56. 3) that this means, 'absit, ne acci-dat'; it is an authoritative declaration, as it were, on Peter's part, This shall not happen to Thee, implying that he knew better, and could ensure his Divine Master against such an event. It is this spirit of confident rejection of God's revealed purpose which the Lord so sharply rebukes. On οὐ μὴ with the future, see note on ch. xv. 6: and consult Winer, as above. 23.] As it was Peter's spiritual discernment, given from above, which made him a foundation-stone of the Church, so is it his carnality, proceeding from want of unity with the divine will, which makes him an adversary now. Compare very expression, ὃν ἀπεδοκίμασαν οἱ οἰκοδομοῦντες, which, as above noticed, occurs in this passage in Mark and Luke.) Wordsw.'s note here, "our blessed Lord keeps up the metaphor of πέτρας, or a stone: thou who wert just now, by thy faith in confessing Me, a lively stone, art now by thy carnal weakness a stumbling stone to Christ," seems to shew that his strong repudiation of any allusion to πέτρας in the πέτρα of ver. 18 has not carried full conviction to its writer. This discourse is a solemn sequel to our Lord's announcement respecting Himself and the rebuke of Peter: teaching that not only He, but also His followers, must suffer and self-deny; that they all have a life to save, more precious than all else to them; and that the great day of account of that life's welfare should be ever before them. On this and the following verse, see ch. x. 38, 39. After τὸν στ. αὐτοῦ, Luke inserts καθ' ἡμῖραν. ²⁶.] There is apparently a reference to Psalm xlviii. (LXX) in this verse. Compare especially the latter part with ver. 7 of that Psalm. τὴν ψ. ζημιώθῃ = ἑαυτὸν δὲ ἀπολίσας Luke. Compare also 1 Pet. i. 18. Compare ch. xxiv. 30; xxv. 31. γάρ] implies, "And it is not without reason that I thus speak: a time will come when the truth of what I say will be shewn." τὴν πρ.] his work, considered as a whole. 28.] This declaration refers, in its full meaning, certainly not to the transfiguration which follows, for that could in no sense (except that of being a foretaste; cf. Peter's own allusion to it, 2 Pet. i. 17, where he evidently treats it as such) be named 'the Son of Man coming in His Kingdom,' and the expression, τὴν πρ. . . οὐ μὴ γ. θ., indicates a distant event,—but to the destruction of Jerusalem, and the full manifestation of the Kingdom of Christ by the annihilation of the Jewish polity; which event, in this aspect as well as in all its terrible attendant details, was a type and earnest of the final coming of Christ. See John xxi. 22, and compare Deut. xxxii. 36 with Heb. x. 30. This dreadful destruction was indeed judgment beginning at the house of God. The interpretation of Meyer, &c., that our Lord referred to His ultimate glorious παρουσία, the time of which was hidden from Himself (see Mark xiii. 32: Acts i. 7), is self-contradictory on his own view of the Person of Christ. That our Lord, in His humanity in the flesh, did not know the day and the hour, we have from His own lips: but that not knowing it, He should have uttered a determinate and solemn prophecy of it, is utterly impossible. His ἀπὸν λέγει ὑμῖν always introduces His solemn and authoritative revelations of divine truth. The fact is, there is a reference back in this discourse to that in ch. x., and the coming here spoken of is the same as that in ver. 23 there. Stier well remarks that this cannot be the great and ultimate coming, on account of οὐ μὴ γεύσ. θανάτου ἕως ἂν ἴδωσιν, which implies that they should taste of death after they had seen it, and would therefore be inapplicable to the final coming (Reden Jesu, ii. 224). This is denied by Wordsw., who substitutes for the simple sense of οὐ μὴ γεύσ. θαν.

the fanciful expositions, "shall not feel its bitterness," "shall not taste of the death of the soul," and then, thus interpreting, gives the prophecy the very opposite of its plain sense: "they will not taste of death till I come: much less will they taste of it then." It might be difficult to account for such a curious wresting of meaning, had he not added, "the signification of ἕως ἂν here may be compared to ἕως οὗ in Matt. i. 25." "Latet anguis in herba."

CHAP. XVII. 1—13.] THE TRANSFIGURATION. Mark ix. 2—13. Luke ix. 28—36. This weighty event forms the solemn installation of our Lord to His sufferings and their result. Those three Apostles were chosen to witness it, who had before witnessed His power over death (Mark v. 37), and who afterwards were chosen to accompany Him in His agony (ch. xxvi. 37), and were (John xx. 2: Mark xvi. 7) in an especial sense witnesses of His resurrection. The Two who appeared to them were the representatives of the law and the prophets: both had been removed from this world in a mysterious manner:—the one without death,—the other by death indeed, but so that his body followed not the lot of the bodies of all; both, like the Greater One with whom they spoke, had endured that supernatural fast of forty days and nights: both had been on the holy mount in the visions of God. And now they came, endowed with glorified bodies before the rest of the dead, to hold converse with the Lord on that sublime event, which had been the great central subject of all their teaching, and solemnly to consign into His hands, once and for all, in a symbolical and glorious representation, their delegated and expiring power. And then follows the Divine Voice, as at the Baptism, commanding however here in addition the sole hearing and obedience of Him whose power and glory were thus testified.

There can be no doubt of the absolute historical reality of this narration. It is united by definite marks of date with what goes before; and by intimate connexion with what follows. It cannot by any unfairness be severed from its context. Nor again is there any thing mentioned which casts a doubt on the reality of the appearances (see below, on δρμα, ver. 9). The persons mentioned were seen by all—spoke—and were recognized. The concurrence between the three Evangelists is exact in all the circumstances, and the fourth alludes, not obscurely, to the event, which it was not part of his purpose to relate; John i. 14. Another of the three spectators distinctly makes mention of the facts here related, 2 Pet. i. 16—18. [I cannot but add, having recently returned from the sight of the wonderful original at Rome, that the great last picture of Raffaele is one of the best and noblest comments on this portion of the Gospel history. The events passing, at the same time, on, and under, the Mount of Transfiguration, are by the painter combined, to carry to the mind of the spectator the great central truth. There is none but Christ to console and to glorify our nature. It is a touching reflection, that this picture was left unfinished by the painter, and carried in his funeral procession. July, 1861.]

1.] μὲν ἡμέρας ἕξ = μετὰ τοὺς λόγους τοὺτους ὡς αἰ ἡμ. δεῦρ Luke ix. 28. The one computation is inclusive, the other not; or perhaps, from the ὡς αἰ being inserted, the one is accurate, the other roughly stated. The time of the transfiguration was probably night, for the following reasons. (1) Luke informs us that the Lord had gone up to the mount to pray; which He usually did at night (Luke vi. 12; xxi. 37; xxii. 39: Matt. xiv. 23, 24 al.). (2) All the circumstances connected with the glorification and accompanying appearances would thus be more prominently seen. (3) The Apostles were asleep, and are described, Luke, ver. 32, as 'having kept awake through it' (διαγρηγορήσαντες). (4) They did not descend till the next day (Luke, ver. 37), which would be almost inexplicable had the event happened by day, but a matter of course if by night. [δρος ὑψ.] The situation of this mountain is uncertain. It was not, probably, Tabor, according to the legend; for on the top of Tabor then most likely stood a fortified town (De Wette, from Robinson). Nor is there any likelihood that it was Panium, near Caesarea Philippi, for the six days would probably be spent in journeying; and they appear immediately after to have come to Capernaum. It was most likely one of the mountains bordering the lake. Luke speaks of it merely as τὸ ὄρος. Stanley, Sinai and Palestine, p. 399, contends for Hermon: as does, though doubtingly, Dr. Thomson, the Land and the Book, p. 231. Stanley thinks that our Lord would still be in the neighbourhood of Caesarea Philippi: and that "it is impossible to look up from the plain to the towering peaks of Hermon, almost the only mountain which deserves the name in Palestine, and one of whose ancient titles ('the lofty peak') was derived from this very circumstance, and not be struck with its appropriateness to the scene . . . High up on its southern slopes there must be many a point where the disciples could be taken 'apart by themselves.' Even the transient comparison of the celestial splendour with the snow, where alone it could be seen in Palestine, should not perhaps be wholly overlooked." 2.] μεταμορ.

3.] There need be no question concerning the manner of the recognition of Moses and Elias by the disciples: it may have been intuitive and immediate. We can certainly not answer with Olshausen, that it may have arisen from subsequent information derived from our Lord, for Peter's words in the next verse preclude this. Luke adds, οἱ ὀφθίντες ἐν δόξῃ λέγουσιν τὴν ἔξοδον αὐτοῦ ἣν ἔμελλεν πληροῦν ἐν Ἱερουσαλὴμ.

4.] Luke inserts, that the Apostles had been asleep, but awakened through this whole occurrence;—thereby distinguishing it from a mere vision of sleep; and that this speech was made ἐν τῷ διαχωρίζεσθαι αὐτοῦ ἀπ' αὐτοῦ. Both Mark and Luke add, that Peter knew not what he said: and Mark—ἐφοβοῖ γὰρ ἰγίνοντο. The speech was probably uttered with reference to the sad announcement recently made by our Lord, and to which his attention had been recalled by the converse of Moses and Elias.

A strange explanation of this verse is adopted by Meyer from Paulus, 'It is fortunate that we disciples are here: let us make,' &c. Surely the words καλὸν ἔστιν ἡμᾶς ὥδε εἶναι will not bear this.

It is one of those remarkable coincidences of words which lead men on, in writing, to remembrances connected with those words, that in 2 Peter i. 14, 15, σκηνώμα and ἔξοδος have just been mentioned before the allusion to this event: see note there.

The ἀκούετε αὐτοῦ, and disappearance of the two heavenly attendants, are symbolically connected,—as signifying that God, who had spoken in times past to the Fathers by the Prophets, henceforth would speak by His

On ver. 12, see note on ch. xi. 14. Our Lord speaks here plainly in the future, and uses the very word of the prophecy

Mal. iv. 6. The double allusion is only the assertion that the Elias (in spirit and power) who foreran our Lord's first coming, was a partial fulfilment of the great prophecy which announces the real Elias (the words of Malachi will hardly bear any other than a personal meaning), who is to forerun His greater and second coming.

43—45. This followed immediately after the miracle (Mark ix. 30);—our Lord went privately through Galilee; ἰδιδασκεν γὰρ π.τ.λ.—the imparting of this knowledge more accurately to His disciples, which He had begun to do in the last chapter, was the reason for His privacy. For more particulars, see Luke, ver. 45: Mark, ver. 32.

24—27.] DEMAND OF THE SACRED TRIBUTE, AND OUR LORD'S REPLY. Peculiar to Matthew. The narrative connects well with the whole chapter, the aim of the events narrated in which is, to set forth Jesus as the undoubted Son of God.

24. οἱ τὰ διδραχμα. This tribute, hardly properly so called, was a sum paid annually by the Jews of twenty years old and upwards, towards the temple in Jerusalem. Exod. xxx. 13: 2 Kings xii. 4: 2 Chron. xxiv. 6. 9. The LXX reckon according to the Alexandrian double drachma, and have therefore, as in the first of the above places, ἤμισιν τοῦ διδραχμοῦ: but Josephus and Philo reckon as here, and Aquila, Exod. xxxviii. 26, and an anonymous interpreter: see Hexapla, and apparently Jerome, Gen. xxiv. 22, translate πρὶ by διδραχμ. Josephus (B. J. vii. 6. 6) says of Vespasian, φέρων δι τοῖς ὅποι δῆπορ' οὐσιν Ἰουδαίοις ἐπίβαλε, δύο δραχμας ἑαστον κελεύσας ἀνὰ πᾶν ἔτος εἰς τὸ καπιτώλιον φέρειν, ὥσπερ πρότερον εἰς τὸν ἐν Ἱεροσολύμοις ναὸν συνετίλουν. See, for more particulars, Winer, RWB, art. Sekel.

It does not quite appear whether this payment was compulsory or not; the question here asked would look as if it were voluntary, and therefore by some declined.

Many Commentators both ancient and modern, and among them no less names than Clement Alex., Origen, Jerome, and Augustine, have entirely missed the meaning of this miracle, by interpreting the payment as a civil one, which it certainly was not. οἱ τ. 3. λαμβ. not the publicans, but they who received the didrachma, i. e. one for each person. Peter answered in the affirmative, probably because he had known it paid before.

25, 26.] The whole force of this argument depends on the fact of the payment being a divine one. It rests on this: 'if the sons are free, then on Me, being the Son of God, has this tax no claim.' κήνσον, money taken according to the reckoning of the census,—a capitation tax: a Latin word. ἀλλοτρίων, all who are not their children; those out of their family.

27.] In this, which has been pronounced (even by Olshausen) the most difficult miracle in the Gospels, the deeper student of our Lord's life and actions will find no difficulty. Our Lord's words amount to this:—"that, notwithstanding this immunity, we (graciously including the Apostle in the earthly payment, and omitting the distinction between them, which was not now to be told to any), that we may not offend them, will pay what is required—and shall find it furnished by God's special providence for us." In the foreknowledge and power which this miracle implies, the Lord recalls Peter to that great confession (ch. xvi. 16), which his hasty answer to the collectors shews him to have again in part forgotten.

Of course the miracle is to be understood in its literal historic sense. The natural interpretation (of Paulus and Storr), that the fish was to be sold for the money (and a wonderful price it would be for a fish caught with a hook), is refuted by the terms of the narrative,—and the mythical one, besides the utter inapplicability of all mythical interpretation to any part of the evangelic history,—by the absence of all possible occasion, and all possible significance, of such a myth. The stater =

CHAP. XVIII. 1—35.] DISCOURSE RESPECTING THE GREATEST IN THE KINGDOM OF HEAVEN. Mark ix. 33—50. Luke ix. 46—50.

1.] In Mark we learn that this discourse arose out of a dispute among the disciples who should be the greatest. It took place soon after the last incident. Peter had returned from his fishing: see ver. 21. The dispute had taken place before, on the way to Capernaum. It had probably been caused by the mention of the Kingdom of God as at hand in ch. xvi. 19, 28, and the preference given by the Lord to the Three. In Mark it is our Lord who asks them what they were disputing about, and they are silent.

Ἄρα need not necessarily refer to the incident last related. As De Wette remarks, it may equally well be understood as indicating the presence in the mind of the querist of something that had passed in the preceding dispute.

2.] From Mark ix. 36 it appears that our Lord first placed the child in the midst, and then took it in His arms : possibly drawing a lesson for His disciples from its ready submission and trustfulness.

3.] στραφῇτε = μεταστῇτε : it also conveys the idea of turning back from the course previously begun, viz. that of ambitious rivalry. Without this they should not only not be pre-eminent in, but not even admitted into, the Christian state—the Kingdom of Heaven.

4.] Not ὡς τὸ παιδ. ε. ταπεινὸν ἑαυτοῦ : 'iste parvulus non se humilitat, sed humilis est.' Valla (in Meyer). 'Quales pueri natura sunt, ab ambitu acilicet alieni, tales nos esse jubemur τῇ προαίρεσι.' Grotius.

5.] Having shewn the child as the pattern of humility, the Lord proceeds to shew the honour in which children are held in His heavenly kingdom ; and not only actual, but spiritual children—for both are understood in the expression παιδιον τοιούτον εν. The receiving in My name is the serving (ἔσται πάντων διάκονος Mark ix. 35) with Christian love, and as belonging to Christ (see also ch. xxv. 40).

6.] Here St. Mark and St. Luke insert the saying of John respecting one casting out demons in Jesus' name, who followed not with the Apostles : which it appears gave rise to the remark in this verse. St. Luke however goes on no further with the discourse : St. Mark inserts also our ch. x. 42. The verbs κρεμασθῇ, καταποντισθῇ, may perhaps be understood in their strict tenses : it is better for him that a millstone should have been hanged, &c., and he drowned . . . before the day when he gives this offence. But this is somewhat doubtful. The aorists more probably, as so often, denote an act complete in itself and accomplished at once : without any strict temporal reference. The punishment here mentioned, drowning, may have been practised in the sea of Galilee ; ('secundum ritum provinciae ejus loquitur, quo majorum criminum ista apud veteres Judaeos pena fuerit, ut in profundum ligato saxo demergerentur.' Jerome in loc.) De Wette however denies this, saying that it was not a Jewish punishment ; but it certainly was a Roman, for Suetonius mentions it as practised by Augustus on the rapacious attendants of Caius Caesar (Aug. ch. lxxvii.) :—and a Macedonian,—Diod. Sic. xvi. 85, ὁ δὲ Φίλιππος τὸν μὲν Ὀνόμαρχον ἐκρίμασι, τοὺς δ' ἄλλους ὡς ἱεροσύλους καταπόντισσε. duas, trusatiles unas. πάλαι, i. e. the deep part, in the open sea. 7.] See 1 Cor. xi. 19. Stier suggests that Judas, who took offence at the anointing in Bethany, may have been on other occasions the man by whom the offence came, and so this may have been said with special reference to him. Still its general import is undeniable and plain. See also Acta ii. 23. 8.] The connexion is—'Wilt thou avoid being the man on whom this woe is pronounced?—then cut off all occasion of offence in thyself first.' The cautions following are used in a wider sense than in ch. v. 29, 30. In Mark, the 'foot' is expanded into a separate iteration of the command. τὸ πῦρ τὸ αἰώνιον, which here first occurs, is more fully in Mark τὸ πῦρ τὸ ἀσβέστον, ὅπου ὁ σκόληξ αὐτῶν οὐ γίγνεται καὶ τὸ πῦρ οὐ σβέννυται.

10.] Hitherto our text has been parallel with that of Mark ix.; from this, Matthew stands alone. The warning against contempt of these little ones must not be taken as only implying 'maxima debetur puero reverentia' (Juv. xiv. 47), nor indeed as relating exclusively, or even principally, to children. We must remember with what the discourse began—a contention who should be greatest among them: and the μικροί are those who are the furthest from these 'greatest,' the humble and new-born babes of the spiritual kingdom. And καταφρονήσῃτε must be understood of that kind of contempt which ambition for superiority would induce for those who are by weakness or humility incapacitated for such a strife. There is no doubt that children are included in the word μικροί, as they are always classed with the humble and simple-minded, and their character held up for our imitation. The little children in the outward status of the Church are in fact the only disciples who are sure to be that in reality, which their Baptism has put upon them, and so exactly answer to the wider meaning here conveyed by the term: and those who would in after-life enter into the kingdom must turn back, and become as these little children—as they were when they had just received the new life in Baptism. The whole discourse is in deep and constant reference to the covenant with infants, which was to be made and ratified by an ordinance, in the Kingdom of Heaven, just as then. On the reason assigned in the latter part of this verse (λέγω γὰρ κ.τ.λ.), there have been many opinions; some of which (e. g.

that given by Webster and Wilkinson, 'ἄγγελοι, their spirits after death:' a meaning which the word never bore,—see Suicer sub voce,—and one respecting which our Lord never could have spoken in the present tense, with διὰ παντός) have been broached merely to evade the plain sense of the words, which is,—that to individuals (whether invariably, or under what circumstances of minor detail, we are not informed) certain angels are allotted as their especial attendants and guardians. We know elsewhere from the Scriptures, both of the Old and New Testament (Ps. xxxiv. 7; xci. 11; Heb. i. 14 al.), that the angels do minister about the children of God: and what should forbid that in this service, a prescribed order and appointed duty should regulate their ministrations? Nay, is it not analogically certain that such would be the case? But this saying of our Lord assures us that such is the case, and that those angels whose honour is high before God are entrusted with the charge of the humble and meek,—the children in age and the children in grace.

The phrase λέγει γὰρ ὑμῖν, or λέγω ὑμῖν, as in Luke xv. 7, 10, is an introduction to a revelation of some previously unknown fact in the spiritual world. Stier has some very beautiful remarks on the guardian angels, and on the present general neglect of the doctrine of angelic tutelage, which has been doubtless a reaction from the idolatrous angel-worship of the Church of Rome (see Acts xii. 15: Daniel xii. 1: in the former case we have an individual, in the latter a national, guardianship).

βλέπουσιν τὸ πρόσ-
ωπον κ.τ.λ., i. e. are in high honour before God; not perhaps especially so, but the meaning may be, 'for they have angelic guardians, who always,' &c. See Tobit xii. 15.

[11. The angels are the servants and messengers of the Son of Man; and they therefore (ἤλθ. γὰρ κ.τ.λ.) are appointed to wait on these little ones whom He came to save: and who, in their utter helplessness, are especially examples of τὸ ἀπολωλός. 'Here,' remarks Stier (ii. 241), 'is Jacob's ladder planted before our eyes: beneath are the little ones;—then their angels;—then the Son of Man in heaven, in whom alone man is exalted above the angels, Who, as the Great Angel of the Covenant, cometh from the Presence and Bosom of the Father;—and above Him again (ver. 14) the Father Himself, and His good pleasure.'] 12, 13.] See notes on Luke xv. 4-6, where the same parable is more expanded. belongs to ἀφ' ἐν, not to πορευθ. See var. read. The preposition of motion, ἐπὶ, gives the idea of the wandering and scattering of the flock over the mountains. If we join the words to πορευθεῖς, we give them an unmeaning emphasis, besides destroying the elegance of the sentence.

14.] This verse sets forth to us the work of the Son as accomplishing the will of the Father;—for it is unquestionably the Son who is the Good Shepherd, searching for the lost, ver. 11. For similar declarations see Ezek. xviii. 23; xxxiii. 11: 2 Pet. iii. 9. The inference from this verse is—'then whoever despises or scandalizes one of these little ones, acts in opposition to the will of your Father in Heaven.' Observe, when the dignity of the little ones was asserted, it was πατρός μου: now that a motive directly acting on the conscience of the Christian is urged, it is πατρός ὑμῶν.

15—20.] OF THE METHOD OF PROCEEDING WITH AN OFFENDING BROTHER: AND OF THE POWER OF THE CHRISTIAN ASSEMBLY IN SUCH CASES. 15.] The connexion of this with the preceding is: Our Lord has been speaking of σκάνδαλα, which subject is the ground-tone of the whole discourse. One kind is, when thou sinnest against another, vv. 7—14. A second kind, when thy brother sins against thee. The remedy for the former must be, in each individual being cautious in his own person,—that of the latter, in the exercise of brotherly love, and if that fail, the authority of the congregation, vv. 15—17. Then follows an exposition of what that authority is, vv. 18—20.

On this verse see Levit. xix. 17, 18. This direction is only in case of personal offence against ourselves, and then the injured person is to seek private explanation, and that by going to his injurer, not waiting till he comes to apologize. The stop must be after μόνον, as ordinarily read, and not after αὐτοῦ, as proposed by Fritzsche and Olshausen, which construction would be contrary to the usage of the N. T.

An attempt has been made (see var. readd.) to render the passage applicable to sin in general, and so to give the Church power over sins upon earth. ἐκέρδηςας, in the higher sense, reclaimed, gained for God, see reff.: and for thyself too: πρῶτον γὰρ ἰζημιον τοῦτον, διὰ τοῦ σκανδάλου ῥη- γνύμενον ἀπὸ τῆς ἀδελφικῆς σου συν- αφίας. tempt of brotherly love is to heal the wound, to remove the offence, in secrecy; to cover the sin: but if this cannot be done, the next step is, to take two or three, still, in case of an adjustment, preventing publicity; but in the other event, providing sufficient legal witness. See ref. and John viii. 17. ῥῆμα, not thing, but word, as always. Cf. St. Paul's apparent reference to these words of our Lord, 2 Cor. xiii. 1. 17. παρακούσῃ] a stronger word than μη ἀκ., implying something of obduracy. τῇ ἐκκλησίᾳ, by what follows, certainly not 'the Jewish synagogue' (for how could vv. 18—20 be said in any sense of it?), but the congregation of Christians; i. e. in early times, such as in Acts iv. 32, the one congregation,—in after times, that congregation of which thou and he are members. That it cannot mean the Church as represented by her rulers, appears by vv. 19, 20,—where any collection of believers is gifted with the power of deciding in such cases. Nothing could be further from the spirit of our Lord's command than proceedings in what were oddly enough called 'ecclesiastical' courts. ἔστω σοὶ κ.τ.λ.] 'let him no longer be accounted as a brother, but as one of those without,' as the Jews accounted Gentiles and Publicans. Yet even then not with hatred, see 1 Cor. v. 11, and compare 2 Cor. ii.

6, 7, and 2 Thess. iii. 14, 15. The articles ὁ ἰθὺς, ὁ τελ., are generic; the expressions being the singulars of οἱ ἰθὺκοί, οἱ τελῶναι. And thus the quality expressed by ἰθὺικός and τελῶννης, rather than the individual who may happen to bear these characters, is prominent in the sentence: the ἰθὺς or the τελ., inasmuch and as far as he is ἰθὺς or τελ. But this is not, as Words., the effect of the article only; the predicate ἰθὺικός conveys plainly enough, that it is as a heathen, not as a man, that he is here introduced. 18.] This verse reasserts in a wider and more general sense the grant made to Peter in ch. xvi. 19. It is here not only to him as the first stone, but to the whole building. See note there, and on John xx. 23, between which and our ch. xvi. 19 this is a middle point. 19. παντὸς πρ.] 'every thing':—but the construction is an instance of attraction: πάν πρᾶγμα, the subject of the sentence, is thrown into government after the verb: the plain construction would be ὅτι πάν πρ., εἰς δύο ὑμ. συμφ. ἐπὶ τ. γ. περὶ αὐτοῦ, οὗ εἰς αἰτήσονται, γενήσεται κ.τ.λ.: so that παντὸς πρ. amounts in English to any thing. This refers to that entire accordance of hearty faith, which could hardly have place except also in accordance with the divine will. It was apparently misunderstood by the Apostles James and

21—35.] REPLY TO PETER'S QUESTION RESPECTING THE LIMIT OF FORGIVENESS; AND BY OCCASION, THE PARABLE OF THE FORGIVEN BUT UNFORGIVING SERVANT. See Luke xvii. 3, 4. It is possible that Peter may have asked this question in virtue of the power of the keys before (ch. xvi. 19) entrusted to him, to direct him in the use of them: but it seems more likely, that it was asked as in the person of any individual: that Peter wished to follow the rules just laid down, but felt a difficulty as to the limit of his exercise of forgiveness.

The Rabbinical rule was, to forgive three times and no more; this they justified by Amos i. 3, &c., Job xxxiii. 29, 30 LXX, and marg. E. V. The expression 'seven times a day' is found Prov. xxiv. 16, in connexion with sinning and being restored: see also Levit. xxvi. 18—28. In our Lord's answer we have most likely a reference to Gen. iv. 24. Seventy times seven, not 'seven and seventy times,' is the rendering. οὐκ ἀριθμὸν τιθεῖς ἰνταῦθα, ἀλλὰ τὸ ἀπειρον καὶ διηκικὲς καὶ αἰεὶ. Chrys.

Hom. lxi. p. 611.

23. διὰ τοῦτο] 'because this is so,' because unlimited forgiveness is the law of the Kingdom of Heaven. The δοῦλοι here are not slaves, but ministers or stewards. By the πραῖτοι of ver. 25 they could not be slaves in the literal sense. But in Oriental language (see Herodotus passim) all the subjects of the king, even the great ministers of state, are called δοῦλοι. The individual example is one in high trust, or his debt could never have reached the enormous sum mentioned. See Isa. i. 18.

24.] Whether these are talents of silver or of gold, the debt represented is enormous, and far beyond any private man's power to discharge. 10,000 talents of silver is the sum at which Haman reckons the revenue derivable from the destruction of the whole Jewish people, Esth. iii. 9. Trench remarks (Parables, p. 124) that we can best appreciate the sum by comparing it with other sums mentioned in Scripture. In the construction of the tabernacle, twenty-nine talents of gold were used (Exod. xxxviii. 24): David prepared for the temple 3000 talents of gold, and the princes 5000 (1 Chron. xxix. 4—7): the Queen of Sheba presented to Solomon 120 talents (1 Kings x. 10): the King of Assyria laid on Hezekiah thirty talents of gold (2 Kings xviii. 14): and in the extreme impoverishment to which the land was brought at last, one talent of gold was laid on it, after the death of Josiah, by the King of Egypt (2 Chron. xxxiv. 3).

47: 2 Kings iv. 1. The similitude is however rather from Oriental despotism: for the selling was under the Mosaic law softened by the liberation at the year of jubilee. The imprisonment also, and the tormentors, vv. 30, 34, favour this view, forming no part of the Jewish law. ἀποδοθῆναι, impersonal, as in E. V. payment to be made. 26.] Luther explains this as the voice of mistaken self-righteousness, which when bitten by sense of sin and terrified with the idea of punishment, runs hither and thither, seeking help, and imagines it can build up a righteousness before God without having yet any idea that God Himself will help the sinner. Trench remarks, "It seems simpler to see in the words nothing more than exclamations characteristic of the extreme fear and anguish of the moment, which made him ready to promise impossible things, even mountains of gold." p. 127. 28.] Perhaps we must not lay stress on ἐξελθὼν, as indicating any wrong frame of mind already begun, as Theophylact does:—the sequel shows how completely he had 'gone out' from the presence of his Lord. At all events the word corresponds to the time when the trial of our principle takes place: when we 'go out' from the presence of God in prayer and spiritual exercises, into the world. We may observe, that forgiveness of sin does not imply a change of heart or principle in the sinner. The fellow-servant is probably not in the same station as himself, but none the less a fellow-servant. The insignificance of the sum is to shew us how trifling any offence against one another is in comparison to the vastness of our sin against God. Chrysostom finely remarks: ὁ δὲ οἶδὲ τὰ ῥήματα πῶς ὁ δὲ ὧν ἰσώθη· καὶ γὰρ αὐτὸς ταῦτὰ ἐπέων ἀπηλλάγη τῶν μυρίων ταλάντων· καὶ οὐδὲ τὸν λιμίνα ἐπίγνω δι' οὗτὸ ναυάγιον διέφυγεν· οὐ τὸ σχῆμα τῆς κτενηρίας ἀνίμνησεν αὐτὸν τῆς τοῦ διαστότου φιλανθρωπίας· ἀλλὰ πάντα ἐκείνα ὑπὸ τῆς πλειονείας καὶ τῆς ὁμότητος καὶ τῆς μνησικακίας ἐκβαλὼν, θηρίων παντὸς χαλεπώτερος ἦν, ἀγχοῦν τὸν συνδούλον. τί ποιεῖς, ἄνθρωπε; σεαυτὸν ἔπνιγεν] So 'obtorto collo ad praetorem trahor,' Plaut. Pœnul. iii. 5. 45. See other examples in Wetstein. The εἰ τι ὀφείλεις, which is beyond doubt the true reading, must be understood as a haughty expression of one ashamed to meet the mention of the paltry sum really owing, and by this very expression generalizing his unforgiving treatment to all who owed him aught.

31.] The fellow-servants ἐλυπήθησαν, the lord ὀργίζεται. Anger is not man's proper mood towards sin, but sorrow (see Ps. cxix. 136), because all men are sinners. These fellow-servants are the praying people of God, who plead with Him against the oppression and tyranny in the world. 32.] ὅτε μὲν μυρία

See note on ch. v. 26.

There is a difficulty made, from the punishment of this debtor for the very debt which had been forgiven, and the question has been asked, 'utrum peccata semel dimissa redeant.' But it is the spiritual meaning which has here ruled the form of the parable. He who falls from a state of grace falls into a state of condemnation, and is overwhelmed with 'all that debt,' not of this or that actual sin formerly remitted, but of a whole state of enmity to God.

Meyer (Comm. in loc.) well remarks, that the motive held up in this parable could only have full light cast on it by the great act of Atonement which the Lord was about to accomplish. We may see from that consideration, how properly it belongs to this last period of His ministry. 35. δ w. ρεω] not ὁμῶν, as in the similar declaration in ch. vi. 14, 15. CHAP. XIX. 1—12.] REPLY TO THE PHARISES' QUESTION CONCERNING DIVORCE. Mark x. 1—12. This appears to be the journey of our Lord into the region beyond Jordan, mentioned John x. 40. If so, a considerable interval has elapsed since the discourse in ch. xviii. 1.] τὰ ὅρα τῆς Ἰουδ. πέραν τοῦ Ἰορδ. form one continuous description. Bethany, where He went, was beyond Jordan, but on the confines of Judaea. See notes on Mark

x. 1, and Luke ix. 51.

2.] This agrees with what is said John x. 41, 42. For ἐθεράω. St. Mark has ἰδιότασεν.

3.] This was a question of dispute between the rival Rabbinical schools of Hillel and Shammai; the former asserting the right of arbitrary divorce, from Deut. xxiv. 1, the other denying it except in case of adultery. It was also, says De Wetste, a delicate question in the place where our Lord now was, — in the dominions of Herod Antipas.

κ. πᾶσαν αἰτ., as E. V. for every cause; — i. e. is any charge which a man may choose to bring against his wife to justify him in divorcing her? So Jos. secutive parts of a continuous narrative, which, from their different diction, and apparent repetition, they have sometimes been supposed not to be. (3) That He quotes as spoken by the Creator the words in Gen. ii. 24, which were actually said by Adam; they must therefore be understood as said in prophecy, divino afflatu, which indeed the terms made use of in them would require, since the relations alluded to by those terms did not yet exist. Augustin. de Nupt. ii. 4, 'Deus utique per hominem dixit quod homo prophetando prædixit.' (4) That the force of the argument consists in the previous unity of male and female, not indeed organically, but by implication, in Adam. Thus it is said in Gen. i. 27, not ἀνδρα καὶ γυναῖκα ἐποίησεν αὐτοῖς, but ἄσεν καὶ θῆλυ ἐκ. αὐ. He made them (man, as a race) male (not, a male) and female: but then the male and female were implicitly shut up in one; and therefore after the creation of woman from man, when one man and one woman were united in marriage they should be one flesh, ἔτεκεν τοῦτου, because woman was taken out of man. The answer then is, that abstractedly, from the nature of marriage, it is indissoluble. The words οὗ δύο are in the LXX and the Samaritan Pentateuch, but not in the Hebrew.

5. εἰς σάρκα μίαν] εἶναι εἰς is not Greek, but a Hebraism, ἡ ἰγῆ (Meyer). Stier remarks, that the essential bond of marriage consists not in unity of spirit and soul, by which indeed the marriage state should ever be hallowed and sweetened, but without which it still exists in all its binding power:—the wedded pair are ONE FLESH, i. e. ONE MAN within the limits of their united life in the flesh, for this world: beyond this limit, the marriage is broken by the death of the flesh. And herein alone lies the justification of a second marriage, which in no way breaks off the unity of love in spirit with the former partner, now deceased. Vol. ii. p. 267, edn. 2. 7—9.] In this second question, the Pharisees imagine that they have overthrown our Lord's decision by a permission of the law, which they call a command (compare ενειπυλαο, ver. 7, with ἐπέτρεψεν, ver. 8). But He answers them that this was done by Moses on account of their hardness and sinfulness, as a lesser of evils, and belonged to that dispensation which παρετήληθεν, Rom. v. 20; τῶν παραβάσεων χάριν παρετήρηθη, Gal. iii. 19. This He expresses by the ὑμῶν, ὑμῖν, ὑμῶν, as opposed to ἀνθρωπος, and to ἀπ' ἀρχῆς. Only that πορνεία, which itself breaks marriage, can be a ground for dissolving it. The question, whether demonstrated approaches to πορνεία, short of the act itself, are to be regarded as having the same power, must be dealt with cautiously, but at the same time with full remembrance that our Lord does not confine the guilt of such sins to the outward act only: see ch v. 28. St. Mark gives this last verse (9) as spoken to the disciples in the house; and his minute accuracy in such matters of detail is well known. This enactment by our Lord is a formal repetition of what He had said before in the Sermon on the Mount, ch v. 32. Notice, as on ch v. 32, ἀπολελυμένην without the art., and thus logically confined to the case of her who has been divorced μη εἰ πορνείᾳ. This not having been seen, expositors (e. g. of late Dr. Wordsworth) have fallen into the mistake of supposing that the dictum applies to the marrying a woman divorced εἰ πορνείᾳ, which grammatically would require τὴν ἀπολελυμένην. The proper English way of rendering the word as it now stands, would be, a woman thus divorced, viz., μη εἰ πορνείᾳ.

10.] αἰτία, not the cause of divorce just mentioned; nor, the condition of the man with his wife: but the account to be given, 'the original ground and principle,' of the relationship of man and wife:—ἰδὲν τοιαύτη ἐστὶν ἡ αἰτία τῆς συζυγίας, Euthym., who however mentions other renderings. The disciples apprehend that the trials and temptations of marriage would prove sources of sin and misery. This question and its answer are peculiar to Matthew. Meyer refers αἰτία back to the αἰτία in ver. 3, and understands it to mean the only reason justifying divorce; but the above interpretation seems to me preferable. 11, 12.] τὸν λόγον τῶτον, this saying of yours, viz. ὁ συμφέρι γαμήσαι. The γάρ in ver. 12 shews that the sense is carried on: see ch i. 18.

Our Lord mentions the three exceptions, the οἷς δίδοται ὁ γαμήσαι. 1. Those who from natural capacity, or if not that, inaptitude, have no tendencies towards marriage: 2. Those who by actual physical deprivation, or compulsion from men, are prevented from marrying: 3. Those who in order to do the work of God more effectually (as e. g. Paul), abstain from marriage, see 1 Cor. vii. 28. The ἐννοῦχοι and ἐννουχίζω in the two first cases are to be taken both literally and figuratively: in the latter, figuratively only. It is to be observed that our Lord does not here utter a word from which any superiority can be attributed to the state of celibacy: the imperative in the last clause being not a command but a permission, as in Rev. xxii. 17. His estimate for us of the expediency of celibacy, as a general question, is to be gathered from the parable of the talents, where He visits with severe blame the burying of the talent for its safer custody. The remark is Neander's, and the more valuable, as he himself lived and died unmarried. See his Leben Jesu, edn. 4, p. 584. ¹³] χωρεῖν, as in E. V. and in ver. 11, to receive it.

16—30.] ANSWER TO THE ENQUIRY OF A RICH YOUNG MAN, AND DISCOURSE THEREUPON. Mark x. 17—31. Luke xviii. 18—30. ¹⁶.] From Luke ver. 18 we learn that he was a ruler: from Mark ver. 17, that he ran to our Lord. The spirit in which he came,—which does not however appear here so plainly as in the other gospels, from the omission of ἀγαθὴ, and the form of our Lord's answer,—seems to have been that of excessive admiration for Jesus as a man of eminent virtue, and of desire to know from Him by what work of exceeding merit he might win eternal life. This spirit He reproves, by replying that there is but One Good, and that the walking by His grace in the way of holiness is the path to life. On the question and answer, as they stand in the received text,—and on their doctrinal bearing, see notes to Mark. This passage furnishes one of the most instructive and palpable cases of the smoothing down of apparent discrepancies by correcting the Gospels out of one another and thus reducing them to conformity. 18.] De Wette observes well, that our Lord gives this enumeration of the commandments to bring out the self-righteous spirit of the young man, which He before saw. He only mentions those of the second table, having in ver. 17, in His declaration respecting ἀγαθός, included those of the first. Mark has the addition of μὴ ἀποστρησας, representing probably the tenth commandment. 19.] καὶ ἀγαπ. τ. τ. α. is peculiar to Matthew. 20.] We may remark that this young man, though self-righteous, was no hypocrite, no Pharisee: he spoke earnestly, and really strove to keep, as he really believed he had kept, all God's commandments. Accordingly Mark adds, that Jesus looking upon him loved him: in spite of his error there was a nobleness and openness about him, contrasted with the hypocritical bearing of the Pharisees and Scribes. 21, 22.] Our Lord takes him on his own shewing. As Mark and Luke add, "One thing is wanting to thee." Supposing thy statement true, this topstone has yet to be laid on the fabric. But then it is to be noticed, that part of that one thing is δευρο ακολουθει μοι (ἀρας τὸν σταυρόν, Mark). Stier remarks, that this was a test of his observance of the first commandment of the first table : of breaking which he is by the result convicted. ἦν γὰρ εἴχ.

κρ. π. is common to Mark, verbatim. 24.] No alteration to κάμιλον is necessary or admissible. That word, as signifying a rope, or cable, seems to have been invented to escape the fancied difficulty here ; see Palm and Roet's or Liddell and Scott's Lex. sub voce, and for the scholia giving the interpretation, Tischendorf's note here. Lightfoot brings instances from the Talmud of similar proverbial expressions regarding an elephant : we have a case in ch. xxiii. 24, of a camel being put for any thing very large : and we must remember that the object here was to set forth the greatest human impossibility, and to magnify divine grace, which could accomplish even that. 25.] τίς, not τίς πλουσιος, which would have been a far shallower and narrower enquiry, but a general question—what man ! Besides the usual reason given for this question, 'since all are striving to be rich,' we must remember that the disciples yet looked for a temporal Kingdom, and therefore would naturally be dismayed at hearing that it was so difficult for any rich man to enter it. 26. ἐμβλέψας] Probably to give force to and impress what was about to be said, especially as it was a saying reaching into the spiritual doctrines of the Gospel, which they could not yet apprehend. τοῦτο, salvation in general, and even of those least likely to be saved.

παρὰ in both cases, as in E. V. with, 'in the estimation of,' 'penes:' a subjective force of the preposition derived from its local meaning of close juxtaposition, in which sense we have it only once in the N. T., John xix. 25.

27.] The disciples, or rather Peter speaking for them, recur to the ἔτις θησ. ἐν οἷς. said to the young man, and enquire what their reward shall be, who have done all that was required of them. He does not ask respecting salvation, but some pre-eminent reward, as is manifest by the answer. The 'all' which the Apostles had left, was not in every case contemptible. The sons of Zebedee had hired servants

(Mark i. 20), and Levi (Matthew ?) could make a great feast in his house. But whatever it was, it was their all.

28—30.] We may admire the simple truthfulness of this answer of our Lord. He does not hide from them their reward: but tells them prophetically, that in the new world, the accomplishment of that regeneration which He came to bring in (see Acts iii. 21: Rev. xxi. 5: Matt. xxvi. 29), when He should sit (καθίσθαι in the active) on His throne of glory (ἐν θρόνῳ r. d. αὐ., the gen. expressing the simple fact of His session on His throne), then they also should sit (καθίσεσθε in the middle) on twelve thrones (ἐν δώδεκα θρόνοις, the accus. expressing motion towards, as prescribed for them by another: "shall be promoted to, and take your seats upon . . .") judging (see ref. 1 Cor.) the twelve tribes of Israel (see Rev. xx. 4; xxi. 12, 14:—one throne, Judas's, another took, Acts i. 20). At the same time he informs them, ver. 29, that this reward should not in its most blessed particulars be theirs alone, but that of every one who should deny himself for Him (see 2 Tim. iv. 8): and (ver. 30) cautions them, referring perhaps especially to Judas, but with a view to all, as appears by the following parable, that many first should be last, and last first.

On ver. 29, Stier remarks that the family relations are mentioned by St. Matthew in the order in which they would be left. On the other points requiring notice, see note on Mark x. 29, 30. Meyer's rendering of ver. 30, joining πρῶτοι with ἔσονται, and thus making ἔσχατοι the subject and πρῶτοι the predicate of the first clause and vice versa in the second, is not so good as the ordinary one: for whereas the πρῶτοι in the first clause, if it belonged to πολλοί, would naturally lose its article, ἔσχατοι, if it belonged to πολλοί, being divided from it by the predicate πρῶτοι, would take its article as the subject; πολλοὶ δὲ ἔσονται πρῶτοι οἱ ἔσχατοι: and the same of πρῶτοι in the second clause: καὶ ἔσχατοι οἱ πρῶτοι, ch. xx. 16, by which Meyer defends his rendering, does not necessitate it, containing the same propositions stated in different order.

CHAP. XX. 1—16.] PARABLE OF THE LABOURERS IN THE VINEYARD. Peculiar to Matthew. In interpreting this difficult Parable, we must first carefully observe its occasion and connexion. It is bound by the γάρ to the conclusion of chap. xix., and arose out of the question of Peter in ver. 27, τί ἀπα λήσῃ ἡμῖν; (1) Its 'punctum saliens' is, that the Kingdom of God is of grace, not of debt; that they who were called first, and have laboured longest, have no more claim upon God than those who were called last: but that to all, His covenant promise shall be fulfilled in its integrity. (2) Its primary application is to the Apostles, who had asked the question. They were not to be of such a spirit, as to imagine, with the murmurers in ver. 11, that they should have something supereminent (because they were called first, and had laboured longest) above those who is their own time were to be afterward called (see 1 Cor. xv. 8—11). (3) Its secondary applications are to all those to whom such a comparison, of first and last called, will apply:—nationally, to the Jews, who were first called, and with a definite covenant, and the Heathens who came in afterwards, and on a covenant, though really made (see Jer. xxxi. 33: Zech. viii. 8: Heb. viii. 10), yet not so open and prominent;—individually, to those whose call has been in early life, and who have spent their days in God's active service, and those who have been summoned later; and to various other classes and persons between whom comparison, not only of time, but of advantages, talents, or any other distinguishing characteristic, can be made: that none of the first of these can boast themselves over the others, nor look for higher place and greater reward, inasmuch as there is but one "gift" of God according to the covenant of grace. And the "first" of these are to see that they do not by pride and self-righteousness become the "last," or worse—be rejected, as nationally were the Jews; for among the many that are called, there are few chosen—many who will fail of the reward in the end. (4) In subordination to this leading idea and warning of the Parable must the circumstances brought before us be interpreted. The day and its hours are not any fixed time, such as the duration of the world, or our Lord's life on earth, or the life of man, exclusively: but the natural period of earthly work as applied to the various meanings of which the parable is capable. The various times of hiring are not to be pressed as each having an exclusive meaning in each interpretation: they serve to spread the calling over the various periods, and to shew that it is again and again made. They are the quarters of the natural day, when the aliquot parts of the day's wages could be earned, and therefore labourers would be waiting. The last of these is inserted for a special purpose, and belongs more expressly to the instruction of the parable.

(5) The μισθός bears an important part in the interpretation. I cannot with Stier (whose comment on this parable I think much inferior to his usual remarks) suppose it to mean "the promise of this life" attached to godliness. His anxiety to escape from the danger of eternal life being matter of wages, has here misled him. But there is no such danger in the interpretation of the parable which I believe to be the true one. The μισθός is the promise of the covenant, uniformly represented by our Lord and His Apostles as a 'reward,' Matt. v. 12; Luke vi. 35; xiv. 14; John iv. 36; 1 Cor. iii. 14; 2 John 8; Heb. x. 35; xi. 6 al., reckoned indeed of free grace; but still, forensically considered, answering to, and represented by, 'wages,' as claimed under God's covenant with man in Christ. (The freeness and sovereignty of God's gift of grace is pointedly set before us in ver. 14, Θεὸς δὲ τοῦ. τ. ἰσχυ. δοῦναι . . .) This μισθός I believe then to be eternal life, or, in other words, GOD HIMSELF (John xvii. 3). And this, rightly understood, will keep us from the error of supposing, that the parable involves a declaration that all who are saved will be in an absolute equality. This gift is, and will be, to each man, as he is prepared to receive it. To the envious and murmurers, it will be as the fruit that turned to ashes in the mouth; by their own unchristian spirit they will "lose the things that they have wrought" (2 John 8), and their reward will be null: in other words, they will, as the spiritual verity necessitates, not enter into that life to which they were called. God's covenant is fulfilled to them—they have received their denarius—but from the essential nature of the μισθός, are disqualified from enjoying its use: for as Gregory the Great remarks (Hom. 19 in Evv., p. 1512) 'cælorum regnum nullus murmurans accipit: nullus qui accipit murmurare poterit.' To those who have known and loved God, it will be, to each as he has advanced in the spiritual life, joy unspeakable and full of glory. [In the 2nd

edn. of the Reden Jesu (p. 299, note), Stier has even more emphatically declared himself in favour of his former view, and that with reference to my note; wenn auch Hilford mir widerspricht und meine Exegese hier "much inferior to his usual remarks" nennt, so muß ich erwarten, ob vielleicht die zweite Auflage mit ihren genaueren Beziehungen ihn besser überzeugt. But after carefully weighing the whole, I am quite unable to accede to his view; indeed I feel more repugnance to it than ever. The "promise of the life that now is" seems to me wholly beneath the dignity of the parable, and in his explanation he appears painfully to feel it so. The text above quoted, 2 John 8, seems to me to furnish the key to the parable, and to have been written with reference to it: and there no one surely could interpret μισθός otherwise than of the μισθός ἐν τοῖς οὐρανοῖς of our ch. v.] ἅμα πρῶτ] See Jer. xxxv. 14, and other places. ἐργάτας] in the primary meanings of the parable, 'apostles, prophets, ministers': distinct from the vines in the vineyard. But inasmuch as every workman is himself subject to the treatment of the husbandman (see John xv. 1, 2), and every man in the Kingdom of God is in some sense or other a worker on the rest, the distinction is not to be pressed—the parable ranges over both comparisons. ἅμπελωνα] not the Jewish church only, as Greswell, Parables, iv. 355 ff., maintains. The Jewish Church was God's vineyard especially and typically; His Church is all ages is His true vineyard, see John xv. 1. Our language admits of the idiom εἰς τὸν ἄμ. αὐ. being exactly rendered—into his vineyard, E. V. 2.] Δε seems to point, as commonly in other references, at the source or foundation of the συμφωνία: see ref. This view is more probable than that which supposes μισθώσασθαι understood. Meyer remarks that the accus. τὴν ἡμέραν must not be regarded as one of time, which would not suit with συμφων. to which it belongs, but as one of secondary reference. The denarius a day was the pay of a Roman soldier in Tiberius' time, a few years before this parable was uttered (see Tacitus, Annal. i. 17). Polybius, ii. 15. 6 (but in illustrating the exceeding fertility and cheapness of the country), mentions that the charge for a day's entertainment in the inns in Cisalpine Gaul was half an as, = $\frac{1}{2}$ th of the denarius. This we may therefore regard as liberal pay for the day's work.

 3, 4.] The third hour, = at the equinox, our 9 a.m., and in summer 8, was the πλήθουσα αγορά, or αγοράς πλήθωρα—when the market was fullest.
 "The market-place of the world is contrasted with the vineyard of the Kingdom of God: the greatest man of business in worldly things is a mere idle gazer, if he has not yet entered on the true work which alone is worth any thing or gains any reward." Stier, ii. p. 307. No positive stipulation is made with these second, but they are to depend on the justice of the householder. They might expect $\frac{1}{2}$ ths of a denarius. From the same dialogue being implied at the sixth and ninth hour (ἰσθῆσιν ὡσαύτως) the 3 εἰς ᾧ δίκαιον is probably in each case the corresponding part of the denarius, at least in their expectation; so that it cannot be said that no covenant was made.

 8.] By the Mosaic law (Deut. xxiv. 15) the wages of an hired servant were to be paid him before night. This was at the twelfth hour, or sunset: see ver. 12. I do not think the ἐπιτροπὸς must be pressed as having a spiritual meaning. If it has, it represents Christ (see Heb. iii. 6, and ch. xi. 27). ἁρξάμενος is not merely expletive,

It is there said that in the rebuilding of the temple, ει μίαν ημεραν της ημερας εργαζαιτο, τον μισθον υπερ ταυτης ενθως λαμβανεν: της ταυτης referring to the μίαν ωραν, not to της ημ., and the fact related being that if any one worked only one hour in the day, he was immediately paid for that hour. Indeed the manifest effect of such a rule as Gresswell supposes, would have been to stop the building, not to hasten it, for if a man could get his day's pay for an hour's work, why work more?

The last words of the verse belong not so much to the parable, as to the first clause, and are placed to account for its being as there described; for, while multitudes are called into the vineyard, many, by murmuring and otherwise disgracing their calling, will nullify it, and so, although first by profession and standing, will not be of the number of the elect: although called, will not be chosen. This request seems to have arisen from the promise made to the twelve in ch. xix. 28. In Mark's account, the two brethren themselves make the request. But the narration in the text is the more detailed and exact; and the two immediately coincide, by our Lord addressing His answer to the two Apostles (ver. 22). The difference is no greater than is perpetually to be found in narrations of the same fact, persons being often related to have done per se what, accurately speaking, they did per aliterum. The mother's name was Salome;—she had followed our Lord from Galilee,—and afterwards witnessed the crucifixion, see Mark xv. 40. Probably the two brethren had directed this request through their mother, because they remembered the rebuke which had followed their former contention about precedence.

^{21.} The places close to the throne were those of honour, as in Josephus, speaking of Saul (Antt. vi. 11. 9), τοῦ μὲν παιδὸς Ἰωάννου ἐκ δεξιῶν, Ἀβιμήρου δὲ τοῦ ἀρχιστρατήγου ἐκ τῶν ἐντρίμων. . . In the Rabbinical work Midrash Tehillim, cited by Wetstein,—God, it is said, will seat the King Messiah at His right hand, and Abraham at his left. One of these brethren, John, the beloved disciple, had his usual place close to the Lord, John xiii. 23 : the other was among the chosen Three (this request hardly can imply in their minds any idea of the rejection of Peter from his peculiar post of honour by the rebuke in ch. xvi. 23, for since then had happened the occurrences in ch. xvii. 1—8, and especially ib. vv. 24—27). Both were called Boanerges, or the sons of thunder, Mark iii. 17. They thought the kingdom of God was immediately to appear, Luke xix. 11. ^{22.} One at least of these brethren saw the Lord on His Cross—on His right and left hand the crucified thieves. Bitter indeed must the remembrance of this ambitious prayer have been at that moment! Luther remarks, 'The flesh ever seeks to be glorified, before it is crucified: exalted, before it is abased.'

The 'cup' is a frequent Scripture image for joy or sorrow : see Ps. xxiii. 5 ; cxvi. 13 : Isa. li. 22 : Matt. xxvi. 42. It here seems to signify more the inner and spiritual bitterness, resembling the agony of the Lord Himself,—and the baptism, which is an important addition in Mark, more the outer accession of persecution and trial,—through which we must pass to the Kingdom of God. On the latter image see Ps. xlii. 7 ; lxix. 2 ; cxxiv. 4. Stier rightly observes that this answer of our Lord contains in it the kernel of the doctrine of the Sacraments in the Christian Church : see Rom. vi. 1—7 : 1 Cor. xii. 13, and note on Luke xii. 50. Some explain their answer as if they understood the Lord to speak of drinking out of the royal cup, and washing in the royal ewer : but the words δύνασθε πλεῖν, and δυνάμεθα, indicating a difficulty, preclude this.

^{23.} The one of these brethren was the first of the Apostles to drink the cup of suffering, and be baptized with the baptism of blood, Acts xii. 1, 2 ; the other had the longest experience among them of a life of trouble and persecution.

The last clause of the verse may be understood as in the E. So Chrys. &c., Grot. al. If however we understand after ἀλλά 'it shall be given by Me,' we may say with Bengel, 'res eodem recidit, sive oppositione, sive exceptione.' ^{25.} The two clauses, . . . κατακυρ. αὐτῶν and . . . κατεξ. αὐτῶν, are parallel, and αὐτῶν lowing:—(1) a payment as equivalent for a life destroyed, Ex. xxi. 30; (2) the price of redemption of a slave, Lev. xxv. 51 al.; (3) 'propitiation for,' as in Prov. xiii. 8, where Aquila, Symmachus, and Theodotion have ἱξίλασμα. λύτρον ἀντὶ πολλῶν here = ἀντίλυτρον ὑπὲρ πάντων 1 Tim. ii. 6. No stress is to be laid on this word πολλῶν as not being πάντων here; it is placed in opposition to the one life which is given—the one for many—and not with any distinction from πάντων. (I may observe once for all, that in the usage of these two words, as applied to our redemption by Christ, πάντων is the OBJECTIVE, πολλῶν the SUBJECTIVE designation of those for whom Christ died. He died for all, objectively; subjectively, the great multitude whom no man could number, πολλοί, will be the saved by Him in the end.) 'As the Son of man came to give His life for many and to serve many, so ye, being many, should be to each one the object of service and self-denial.' Hofmann, Schriftbeweis, ii. 1, p. 197, argues for ἀντὶ πολλῶν being taken with δοῦναι, not with λύτρον. But Meyer well remarks, 1) that the sense of ἀντὶ will not be altered by this, and 2) that this sense is clearly marked by λύτρον to be that of substitution, not, as Hofm., that of compensation merely.

29—34.] HEALING OF TWO BLIND MEN ON HIS DEPARTURE FROM JERICHO, Mark x. 46—52. Luke xviii. 35—43; xix. 1, with however some remarkable differences. In the much more detailed account of St. Mark, we have but one blind man, mentioned by name as Bartimæus; St. Luke also relates it of only one, and besides says that it was ἐν τῷ ἰγγιζειν αὐτὸν εἰς Ἱεριχὼ. The only fair account of such differences is, that they existed in the sources from which each Evangelist took his narrative. This later one is easily explained, from the circumstance having happened close to Jericho—in two accounts, just on leaving it—in the third, on approaching to it: but he must be indeed a slave to the letter, who would stumble at such discrepancies, and not rather see in them the corroborating coincidence of testimonies to the fact itself (see Olshausen, Comment. i. 752). Yet Mr. Greswell (as Theophylact, —Neander, and Ebrard, Evangelien-kritik, p. 572) strangely supposes our Lord to have healed one blind man (as in Luke) on entering Jericho, and another (Bartimæus, as in Mark) on leaving it,—and Matthew to have, 'with his characteristic brevity in relating miracles,' combined both these in one. But then, what becomes of Matthew's assertion, ἐκπορευομένων αὐτῶν ἀπὸ Ἱερ.? Can we possibly imagine, that the Evangelist, having both facts before him, could combine them and preface them with what he must know to be false? It is just thus that the Harmonists utterly destroy the credibility of the Scripture narrative. Accumulate upon this the absurd improbabilities involved in two men, under the same circumstances, addressing our Lord in the same words at so very short an interval,—and we may be thankful that biblical criticism is at length being emancipated from 'forcing narratives into accordance.' See notes on Mark: and a more curious and more recent example of harmonistic ingenuity, in Wordsw.'s note here. It is highly instructive to us, that a Commentator, with the marks of sequence in time given by ἐν τῷ ἰγγιζειν αὐτὸν εἰς Ἱερ. and ἐκπορευομένων αὐτῶν ἀπὸ Ἱερ., should fly for a solution to the rabbinical canon, "non est prius aut posterius in Scripturâ."

JERICHO, 150 stadia (= 18 rom. miles) N. E. of Jerusalem (Jos. B. J. iv. 8. 3), and 60 (= 7.2 rom. miles) W. from the Jordan (Jos. ibid.), in the tribe of Benjamin (Josh. xviii. 21), near the borders of Ephraim (Josh. xvi. 7). The environs were like an oasis surrounded by high and barren limestone mountains,—well watered and fertile, rich in palm-trees (Dent. xxxiv. 8. Judg. i. 16; iii. 18), roses (Sir. xxiv. 14), and balsam (Jos. Antt. iv. 6. 1 al.). After its destruction by Joshua, its rebuilding was prohibited under a curse (Josh. vi. 26), which was incurred by Hiel the Bethelite in the days of Ahab (1 Kings xvi. 34): i. e. he fortified it, for it was an inhabited city before (see Judg. iii. 18; 2 Sam. x. 5). We find it the seat of a school of the prophets, 2 Kings ii. 4 ff. After the captivity we read of it Ezra ii. 34; Neh. vii. 36; and in 1 Macc. ix. 50 we read that Jonathan strengthened its fortifications. It was much embellished by Herod the Great, who had a palace there (Jos. Antt. xvi. 5. 2 al.), and at this time was one of the principal cities of Palestine, and the residence of an ἀρχιεπίσκοπος on account of the

 xix. 29—44. John xii. 12—36. This occurrence is related by all four Evangelists, with however some differences, doubtless easily accounted for, if we knew accurately the real detail of the circumstances in chronological order. In John (xii. 1),—our Lord came six days before the Passover to Bethany, where the anointing (of Matt. xxvi. 6—13) took place: and on the morrow, the triumphal entry into Jerusalem was made. According to Mark
 xi. 11,—on the day of the triumphal entry He only entered the city, went to the temple, and looked about on all things,— and then, when now it was late in the evening, returned to Bethany, and on the morrow the cleansing of the temple took place.
 The account in Luke, which is the fullest and most graphic of the four, agrees chronologically with that in the text. I would venture to suggest, that the supposition of the triumphal entry in Mark being related a day too soon, will bring all into unison. If this be so, our Lord's first entry into Jerusalem was private: probably the journey was interrupted by a short stay at Bethany, so that He did not enter the city with the multitudes. That this was the fact, seems implied in Mark xi. 11. Then it was that, περιβλεψάμενος πάντα, He noticed the abuse in the temple, which next day He corrected. Then in the evening He went back with the twelve to Bethany, and the supper there, and anointing, took place. Meantime the Jews (John xii. 9) knew that He was at Bethany; and many went there that evening to see Him and Lazarus. (Query, had not Lazarus followed Him to Ephraim?) Then on the morrow multitudes came out to meet Him, and the triumphal entry took place, the weeping over the city (Luke xix. 41), and the cleansing of the temple. The cursing of the fig-tree occurred early that morning, as He was leaving Bethany with the twelve, and before the multitudes met Him or the asses were sent for. (On Matthew's narrative of this event see below on ver. 18.) According to this view, our narrative omits the supper at Bethany, and the anointing (in its right place), and passes to the events of the next day. On the day of the week when this entry happened, see note on John xii. 1. Βηθφαγῇ = βῆθ βῆθ, the house of figs: a considerable suburb, nearer to Jerusalem than Bethany, and sometimes reckoned part of the city. No trace of it now remains: see the Land and the Book, p. 697. 2, 3.] τὴν κ. τ. ἀν., i. e. Bethphage. Mark and Luke mention the πῶλος only, adding "whereon never yet man sat" (see note on Mark): John δνάριον. Justin Martyr (Apolog. i. 82, p. 63) connects this verse with the prophecy in Gen. xlix. 11, διαμῖνον πρὸς ἀμπέλον τὸν πῶλον ἀβρού, καὶ τῇ ἑλκεῖ τὸν πῶλον τῆς θου ἀβρού. δ κύριος, here, 'the LORD,' Jehovah (see ref.): most probably a general intimation to the owners, that they were wanted for the service of God. I cannot see how this interpretation errs against decorum, as Stier (ii. 332, edn. 2) asserts. The meanest animals might be wanted for the service of the Lord Jehovah. And after all, what difference is there as to decorum, if we understand with him δ κῆρ. to signify "the King Messiah?" The two disκαὶ ὁ βασιλεὺς Ἰσρ. ¹².] Compare the notes on John ii. 13—18. The cleansing related in our text is totally distinct from that related there. It is impossible to suppose that St. Matthew and St. John, or any one but moderately acquainted with the events which he undertook to relate, should have made such a gross error in chronology, as must be laid to the charge of one or other of them, if these two occurrences were the same.

I rather view the omission of the first in the synoptic accounts as in remarkable consistency with what we otherwise gather from the three Gospels—that their narrative is exclusively Galilaean until this last journey to Jerusalem, and consequently the first cleansing is passed over by them (see Prolegomena, circa init.).

On the difference from Mark, see note on ver. 1. Both comings of Jehovah to His temple were partial fulfilments of Mal. iii.
1—3,—which shall not receive its final accomplishment till His great and decisive visit at the latter day. The lepén here spoken of was the court of the Gentiles.

We have no traces of this market in the O. T. It appears to have first arisen after the captivity, when many would come from foreign lands to Jerusalem. This would also account for the money-changers, as it was unlawful (from Exod. xxx. 13) to bring foreign money for the offering of atonement. ἐλλάβετο λίγισται τὸ λιπρὸν

This assurance has occurred before in ch. xvii. 20. That truest and highest faith, which implies a mind and will perfectly in unison with that of God, can, even in its least degree, have been in Him only who spoke these words. And by it, and its elevating power over the functions and laws of inferior natures, were His most notable miracles wrought. It is observable, that such a state of mind entirely precludes the idea of an arbitrary exercise of power—none such can therefore be intended in our Lord's assertion—but we must understand,—"if expedient." Though we cannot reach this faith in its fulness, yet every approach to it (ver. 21) shall be ended with some of its wonderful power,—in obtaining requests from God. See the remarkable and important addition in Mark xi. 25, 26.

23—24.] Mark xi. 27—33. Luke xx. 1—8. OUR LORD'S AUTHORITY QUESTIONED. HIS REPLY. Now commences that series of parables, and discourses of our Lord with his enemies, in which He develops more completely than ever before His hostility to their hypocrisy and iniquity:—and so they are stirred up to compass His death.

23. οἱ ἀρχ. κ. οἱ πρεσ. τ. λ. Mark and Luke add γραμματεῖς, and so make up the members of the Sanhedrim. It was an official message, sent with a view to make our Saviour declare Himself to be a prophet sent from God—in which case the Sanhedrim had power to take cognizance of His proceedings, as of a professed Teacher. Thus the Sanhedrim sent a deputation to John on his appearing as a Teacher, John i. 19. The question was the result of a combination to destroy Jesus, Luke xix. 47, 48. They do not now ask, as in John ii. 18, τί σημεῖον δεικνύεις ἡμῖν ὅτι ταῦτα ποιεῖς; for they had had many signs, which are now included in their ταῦτα.

The second question, καὶ τίς κ.τ.λ. is an expansion of ποία. 25.] τὸ βάπτ., meaning thereby the whole office and teaching, of which the baptism was the central point and seal. If they had recognized the heavenly mission of John, they must have also acknowledged the authority by which Jesus did these things, for John expressly declared that he was sent to testify of Him, and bore witness to having seen the Holy Spirit descend and rest upon Him. John i. 33, 34. εἰσωτ. αὐτῷ—believe him, 'give credit to his words'; 'for those words were testimonies to me.' 26.] These 'blind leaders of the blind' had so far made an insincere concession to the people's persuasion as to allow John to pass for a prophet—but they shrunk from the reproach which was sure to follow their acknowledging it now. This consultation among themselves is related almost verbatim by the three Evangelists. The intelligence of it may have been originally derived from Nicodemus or Joseph of Arimathea. The οὐδὲ ἐγὼ λέγω of our Lord is an answer, not to their outward words οὐκ οἶδαμεν, but to their inward thoughts, οὐ θέλομεν λήγειν. 28.] τί δὲ ἓ. 8.: a formula of connexion—but doubtless here intended to help the questioners to the true answer of their difficulty about John's baptism. The following parable (peculiar to Matthew) refers, under the image of the two sons, to two classes of persons, both summoned by the great Father to "work in His vineyard" (see ch. xx. 1); both Jesus and of His family. The first answer the summons by a direct and open refusal—these are the open sinners, the publicans and harlots, who disobey God to His face. But afterwards, when better thoughts are suggested, they repent, and go. The second class (no stress is to be laid on the order of calling—the parable merely mentions that the call was made ἀπ' αὐτοῦ—it is the mistaken desire to set the chronology right which has given rise to such confusion in the readings) receive the summons with a respectful assent (not unaccompanied with a self-exaltation and contrast to the other,

These are the Scribes and Pharisees, with their shew of legal obedience, who “said, and did not” (ch. xxiii. 3). It will of course admit of wider applications—to Jews and Heathens, or any similar pair of classes who may thus be compared. ^{31.}] In connexion with the reading ὁ ὑστερος, which Tregelles has adopted without the preceding transposition, it may be mentioned, that some (not Origen, that I can find) have understood it to mean, ὁ ὑστερον μεταμεληθεῖς. προ-ἀγοσιν, either the declarative present—go before you, in the matter of God’s arrangements,—or the assertive present, of the mere matter of fact, are going before you. 37. for προς αυτους, αυτοις D al lat-a b c ff; 2 Iren-lat Lucif Arnob Ambr.

1—12: Luke xx. 9—19. This parable is in intimate connexion with Isa. v. 1 ff., and was certainly intended by our Lord as an express application of that passage to the Jews of His time. Both Mark and Luke open it with an ἡγήσατο λίγειν . . . , as a fresh beginning, by our Lord, of a series of parables. Luke adds, that it was spoken πρὸς τὸν λαόν. Its subject is, of course, the continued rejection of God's prophets by the people of Israel, till at last they rejected and killed His only Son. The οἰκοδεσπότης ἐφύτευεν ἀμπελῶνα: i. e. 'selected it out of all His world, and fenced it in, and dug a receptacle for the juice (in the rock or ground, to keep it cool, into which it flowed from the press above, through a grated opening), and built a tower (of recreation—or observation to watch the crops).' This exactly coincides with the state of the Jewish nation, under covenant with God as His people. All these expressions are in Isaiah v. The letting out to husbandmen was probably that kind of letting where the tenant pays his rent in kind, although the καρποί may be understood of money. God began about 430 years after the Exodus to send His prophets to the people of Israel, and continued even till John the Baptist; but all was in vain; they "persecuted the prophets," casting them out, and putting them to death. (See Neh. ix. 26: Matt.

xxiii. 31, 37: Heb. xi. 36—38.) The different readings must not be pressed; they probably imply the fullness and sufficiency of warnings given, and set forth the long suffering of the householder; and the increasing rebellion of the husbandmen is shewn by their increasing ill-treatment of the messengers. Meyer understands αὐτοῦ after καρπούς, ver. 34, to mean His fruits; i. e. in money. 37.] See Luke ver. 18: Mark ver. 6. Our Lord sets forth His heavenly Father in human wise deliberating, τί ποιήσω; (Luke) and ἵσως ἔστω, to signify His gracious adoption, for man's sake, of every means which may turn sinners to repentance. The difference here is fully made between the Son and all the other messengers; see Mark; ἵνα υἱὸν εἴχην ἀγαπητόν . . . and, as Stier remarks, this is the real and direct answer to the question in ver. 28. The Son appears here, not in his character of Redeemer, but in that of a preacher—a messenger demanding the fruits of the vineyard. (See ch. iv. 17.) 38. οὗτός ἐστιν] So Nicodemus, John iii. 2, οὗτος ἐστὶν ἀπὸ θ. ἐληλυθας διδάσκαλος, even at the beginning of His ministry; how much more then after three years spent in His divine working. The latent consciousness that Jesus was the Messiah, expressed in the prophecy of Caiaphas (John xi. 49—52;

ὁ υἱὸς ἀποκτ. ἀστ.] The very words of the LXX, ref. Gen., where Joseph's brethren express a similar resolution: and no doubt used by the Lord in reference to that history, so deeply typical of His rejection and exaltation. This resolution had actually been taken, see John xi. 53: and that immediately after the manifestation of His power as the Son of God (πάτερ, ἐγχαριστῶ σοι κ.τ.λ. John xi. 41), in the raising of Lazarus, and also immediately (ὁδὸν) after Caiaphas's prophecy. καὶ σκ.] See John xi. 48. As far as this, the parable is History: from this point, Prophecy. ^{39.}] This is partly to be understood of our Lord being given up to the heathen to be judged; but also literally, as related by all three Evangelists. See also John xix. 17, and Heb. xiii. 11, 12. In Mark the order is different, ἀπέκτειναν κ. ἐξέβ. ἔξω.

^{40, 41.}] See Isa. v. 5. All means had been tried, and nothing but judgment was now left. Mark and Luke omit the important words λέγουσιν αὐτῷ, though Luke has given us the key to them, in telling us that the parable was spoken in the hearing of the people, who seem to have made the answer. Perhaps however the Pharisees (as suggested by Trench, Parables, in loco) may have made this answer, having missed, or (as Olshausen thinks, Biblisch. Comm. i.

p. 793, and Stier, R. J. ii. 363) pretended to miss, the sense of the parable; but from the strong κακοὺς κακῶς, I incline to the former view. Whichever said it, it was a self-condemnation, similar to that in ch. xxvii. 26: the last form, as Nitzsch finely remarks (cited by Stier, ib.), of the divine warnings to men, 'when they themselves speak of the deeds which they are about to do, and pronounce judgment upon them.' So striking, even up to the last moment, is the mysterious union of human free-will with divine foresight (see Acts ii. 23: Gen. i. 20), that after all other warnings frustrated, the conscience of the sinner himself interposes to save him from his sin.

The expression κακοὺς κακῶς ἀπολ. is one of the purest Greek:—ἀπὸ ὧν κακὸν κακῶς, Aristoph. Plut. 66, and indeed passim in the best writers.

οἵτινες] of a kind, who: οἷ would identify, οἷτινες classifies. They do not specify who, but only of what sort, the new tenants will be. The clause is peculiar to Matthew. We may observe that our Lord here makes τὴν ἄσπιν ὁ κύριος coincide with the destruction of Jerusalem, which is incontestably the overthrow of the wicked husbandmen. This passage forms therefore an important key to our Lord's prophecies, and a decisive justification for those who, like myself, firmly hold that the coming of the Lord is in many places to be identified, primarily, with that overthrow. ^{42.}] A citation from the same Psalm of triumph from which the multitudes had taken their Hosannas. This verse is quoted with the same signification in Acts iv. 11: 1 Pet. ii. 6, 7, where also the cognate passage Isa. xxviii. 16 is quoted, as in Rom. ix. 33. The words here are those of the LXX. αἵτη . . . θαυμαστὴ . . . are feminine by a Hebraism, in which idiom the fem. is used as the neuter, there being no neuter. Meyer takes it as agreeing with εἰς γωνίας, but surely with the examples in the ref. before us, it is simpler and better to understand the construction as above. The οἰκοδομοῦντες answer to the husbandmen, and the addition is made in this changed similitude to shew them that though they might reject and kill the Son, yet He would be victorious in the end.

εἰς καψ. γων.] The corner-stone binds together both walls of the building; so Christ unites Jews and Gentiles in Himself. See the comparison beautifully followed into detail, Eph. ii. 20—22.

On θαυμαστὴ ἐν ὀφθ. ἡμ., cf. Acts iv. 13, 14. 43.] Our Lord here returns to the parable, and more plainly than ever before announces to them their rejection by God. The ἀμυσλόν is now ἡ βασ. τ. θ. The ἔθνος here spoken of is not the Gentiles in general, but the Church of the truly faithful,—the ἔθνος ἅγιον, λαὸς εἰς περιποίησιν of 1 Pet. ii. 9: see Acts xv. 14. 44.] A reference to Isa. viii. 14, 15, and Dan. ii. 44, and a plain identification of the stone there mentioned with that in Ps. cxviii. The stone is the whole kingdom and power of the Messiah summed up in Himself.

δ πεσὼν . . . he that takes offence, that makes it a stone of stumbling, shall be broken: see Luke ii. 34: but on whomsoever, as its enemy, it shall come in vengeance, as prophesied in Daniel, λικμήσει αὐτόν, it shall dash him in pieces. Meyer maintains that the meaning of λικμ. is not this, but literally 'shall winnow him,' throw him off as chaff (see ref. Job). But the confusion in the parable thus occasioned is quite unnecessary. The result of winnowing is complete separation and dashing away of the worthless part: and it is surely far better to understand this result as the work of the falling of the stone, than to apply the words to a part of the operation for which the falling of a stone is so singularly unsuited.

45, 46.] All three Evangelists have this addition. St. Mark besides says καὶ ἀπέναντι αὐτὸν ἀνήλθον, answering to our ch. xxii. 22. Supposing Mark's insertion of these words to be in the right place, we have the following parable spoken to the people and disciples: see below.

CHAP. XXII. 1—14.] PARABLE OF THE MARRIAGE OF THE KING'S SON. Peculiar to Matthew. A parable resembling this in several particulars occurs in Luke xiv. 15—24, yet we must not hastily set it down as the same. Many circumstances are entirely different: the locality and occasion of delivery different, and in both cases stated with precision. And the difference in the style of the parables is correspondent to the two periods of their utterance. That in Luke is delivered earlier in our Lord's ministry, when the enmity of the Pharisees had yet not fully manifested itself: the refusal of the guests is more courteous, their only penalty, excision;—here they maltreat the servants, and are utterly destroyed. This binds the parable in close connexion with that of the wicked husbandmen in the last chapter, and with this period of our Lord's course. 2.] The householder of the course. 2.] The householder of the former parable is the KING here, who ἔστειλε γάμος for his Son. γάμος are not always necessarily 'a marriage,' but any great celebration, as accession to the throne, or coming of age, &c. See Eth. i. 5, LXX. Meyer (in loc.) denies this, but does not refer to the passage of Ether just cited, which to my mind is decisive. Eth. ix. 22 is not satisfactorily explained on his interpretation, viz. that the LXX translate freely and exegetically,—but is another instance in point. Here however the notion of a marriage is certainly included; and the interpretation is, the great marriage supper (Rev. xix. 9) of the Son of God: i. e. His full and complete union to His Bride the Church in glory: which would be to the guests the ultimate result of accepting the invitation. See Eph. v. 25–27. The difficulty, of the totality of the guests in this case constituting the Bride, may be lessened by regarding the ceremony as an enthronization, in which the people are regarded as being espoused to their prince. On the whole imagery, cf. Ps. xlv. 3.] These δούλοι are not the prophets, not the same as the servants in ch. xxi. 34, as generally interpreted—the parable takes up its ground nearly from the conclusion of that former, and is altogether a New Testament parable. The office of these δούλοι ('κλήτορες, διπνοκλήτορες, vocatores, invitatores,' Webst. and Wilk.) was καλίστας τοὺς κεκλημένους, to summon those who had been invited, as was customary (see Euth. v. 8 and vi. 14); these being the Jewish people, who had been before, by their prophets and covenant, invited. These first δούλοι are then the first messengers of the Gospel,—John the Baptist, the Twelve, and the Seventy,—who preached, saying 'The Kingdom of heaven is at hand.' And even our Lord Himself must in some sort be here included, inasmuch as He μορφήν δούλου ἔλαβεν, and preached this same truth, with however the weighty addition of δεῦτε πρὸς μ.

4. We now come to a different period of the Evangelic announcement. Now, all is ready: the sacrifice, or the meat for the feast, is slain. We can hardly help connecting this with the declarations of our Lord in John vi. 51-59, and supposing that this second invitation is the preaching of the Apostles and Evangelists after the great sacrifice was offered. That thus the slaying of the Lord is not the doing of the invited, but is mentioned as done for the Feast, is no real difficulty. Both sides of the truth may be included in the parable, as they are in Acts ii. 23, and indeed wherever it is set forth. The discourse of Peter in that chapter is the best commentary on πᾶντα ἔσθμα· δεῖτε εἰς τοὺς γ. Meyer well remarks that ἄριστον is not = δεικνυν, but is the meal at noon with which the course of marriage festivities began. This will give even greater precision to the meaning of the parable as applying to these preparatory foretastes of the great feast, which the Church of God now enjoys. As the former parable had an O. T. foundation, so this: viz. Prov. ix. 1 ff. 5, 6.] Two classes are here represented: the irreligious and careless people (notice τὸν ἑαυτὸν ἀγρόν, bringing out the selfish spirit), and the rulers, who persecuted and slew God's messengers. Stephen,—James the brother of John, James the Just, and doubtless other of the Apostles of whose end we have no certain account, perished by the hands or instigation of the Jews: they persecuted Paul all through his life, and most probably brought him to his death at last: and the guilt of the death of the Lord abode upon them (ch. xxvii. 25). They repeatedly insulted and scourged the Apostles (see Acts iv. 3; v. 18, 40). 7.] The occurrence of this verse before the opening of the Feast to the Gentiles has perplexed some interpreters: but it is strictly exact: for although the Gospel was preached to the Gentiles forty years before the destruction of Jerusalem, yet the final rejection of the Jews and the substitution of the Gentiles did not take place till that event. τὰ στρατ. αὐτοῦ] The Roman armies; a similar expression for the unconscious instruments of God's anger is used Isa. x. 5; Jer. xxv. 9: Joel ii. 28. τὴν πόλιν αὐτῆς.] no longer His, but their city. Compare δ αἰκὸς τῶν ch. xxiii. 38. This is a startling introduction of the interpretation into the parable; we knew not before that they had a city. 8—10.] On οὐκ ἔστιν see Acts xiii. 46. ἦσαν, as Bengel,—“praeteritum indignos eo magis praetermittit.” Βασιλῆες are the places of resort at the meetings of streets, the squares, or confluences of ways. De Wette and Meyer are wrong in saying that they are not in the city, ‘for that was destroyed’: it is not the city of the murderers, but that in which the feast is supposed to be held, which is spoken of: not Jerusalem, but

God's world. πονηρ. τε κ. αγαθ.] Both the open sinners and the morally good together. See ch. xiii. 47, where the net collects ἐκ παντός γένους. Stier remarks that we might expect, from ch.
 xxi. 31, to find the guest who by and by
 is expelled, among the αγαθοί. δ γαμος is here the feast, not the place where it was held.

Here, so to speak, the first act of the parable closes; and here is the situation of the Church at this day;— collected out of all the earth, and containing both bad and good. ἐπλήσθη, as Meyer well remarks, is emphatic.

11, 12.] This second part of the parable is in direct reference to the word of prophesy, Zeph. i. 7, 8: cf. especially ver. 8, καὶ ἔσται ἐν ἡμέρᾳ θυσίας κυρίου καὶ ἐξἐκίσσω . . . ἐπὶ πάντας τοὺς ἐνδεδυμέ-νους ἐνδύματα ἀλλότρια. The coming of the King to see his guests is the final and separating Judgment of the Church, see ch. xxv. 19,—when that distinction shall be made, which God's ministers have no power nor right to make in admissions into the visible Church. Yet as Trench remarks (Parables, p. 207), this coming of the King is not exclusively the final one, but every trying and sifting judgment adumbrates it in some measure.

With regard to the ἔνδυμα γάμου, we must not, I think, make too much of the usually cited Oriental custom of presenting the guests with such garments at feasts. For (1) it is not distinctly proved that such a custom existed; the passages usually quoted (Gen. xiv. 22: Judges xiv.

 12: 2 Kings v. 22) are nothing to the purpose; 2 Kings x. 22 shews that the worshippers of Baal were provided with vestments, and at a feast: and at the present day those who are admitted to the presence of Royalty in the East are clothed with a caftan: but all this does not make good the assumption: and (2) even granting it, it is not to be pressed, as being manifestly not the punctum saliens of this part of the parable. The guest was bound to provide himself with this proper habit, out of respect to the feast and its Author: how this was to be provided, does not here appear, but does elsewhere. The garment is the imputed and inherent righteousness of the Lord Jesus, put on symbolically in Baptism (Gal. iii. 27), and really by a true and living faith (ib. ver. 26),—without which none can appear before God in His Kingdom of Glory;—Heb. xii. 14: Phil. iii.

festation threw its great light over this and other such similitudes and expressions. This guest imagines his own garment will be as acceptable, and therefore neglects to provide himself. See 1 John v. 10: Isa. liiv. 6; lxi. 10: Rev. xix. 8.

ἐταῖρος] see note on ch. xx. 13: and, as a curiosity of exegetical application, Wordsw.'s note here. 13, 14.] The δῖσκοι are not the same as the δοῦλοι above, but the angels, see ch. xiii. 41, 49. The 'binding of his feet and hands' has been interpreted of his being now in the night, in which no man can work; but I doubt whether this be not too fanciful. Rather should we say, with Meyer, that it is to render his escape from the outer darkness impossible. On τὸ σκ. τὸ ἔξ. see reff. In ver. 14 our Lord shews us that this guest, thus single in the parable, is, alas, to be the representative of a numerous class in the visible Church, who, although sitting down as guests before His coming, have not on the ἵνδυμα γάμου.

15—23.] REPLY CONCERNING THE LAWFULNESS OF TRIBUTE TO CESAR. Mark xii. 13—17. Luke xx. 20—26. On the Herodians, see above, ch. xvi. 6. By the union of these two hostile parties they perhaps thought that the ὑπαθεροι (Luke), who were to feign themselves honest men, Luke xx. 20, would be more likely to deceive our Lord. For this also is their flattery here designed. 'The devil never lies so foully, as when he speaks the truth.' Meyer compares that other οἶδαμεν ὅτι, John iii. 2. The application may have been as if to settle a dispute which had sprung up between the Pharisees, the strong theocratic repudiators of Roman rule, and the Herodians, the hangers-on of a dynasty created by Caesar. In case the answer were negative, these last would be witnesses against Him to the governor (Luke xx. 20); as indeed they became, with false testimony, when they could not get true, Luke xxiii. 2; in case it were affirmative, He would be compromised with the Roman conquerors, and could not be the people's deliverer, their expected Messias; which would furnish them with a pretext for stirring up the multitudes against Him (see Deut. xvii. 15).

17.] κήνσος = φόρος, Luke xx. 22; = ἱπποφάλαιον: a poll-tax, which had been levied since Judæa became a province of Rome.

18—23.] Our Lord not only detects their plot, but answers their question; and in answering it, teaches them each a deep lesson.

The νόμισμα κήνσον was a denarius. It was a saying of the Rabbis, quoted by Lightfoot and Wetstein, that 'wherever any king's money is current, there that king is lord.' The Lord's answer convicts them, by the matter of fact that this money was current among them, of subjection to (Tiberius) Caesar, and recognition of that subjection: Pay therefore, He says, that which is Caesar's to Caesar, and (not perhaps without reference to the Herodians, but with much deeper reference) that which is God's, to God. These weighty words, so much misunderstood, bind together, instead of separating, the political and religious duties of the followers of Christ. See Jer. xxvii. 4—18: Rom. xiii. 1: 1 Pet. ii. 13, 14: John xix. 11. The second clause comprehends the first, and gives its true foundation: q. d. 'this obedience to Caesar is but an application of the general principle of obedience to God, of Whom is all power.' The latter clause thus reaches infinitely deeper than the former: just as our Lord in Luke x. 41, 42 declares a truth reaching far beyond the occasion of the meal. Man is the coinage, and bears the image, of God (Gen. i. 27): and this image is not lost by the fall (Gen. ix. 6: Acts xvii. 29: James iii. 9. See also notes on Luke xv. 8, 9: and compare Tertull. contr. Marc. iv. 38, p. 453, "Quæ erant Dei? quæ similia sunt denario Caesaris, imago scilicet et similitudo ejus. Hominem igitur reddi jubet Creatori, in cujus imagine et similitudine et nomine et materia expressus est"). We owe then ourselves to God: and this solemn duty is implied, of giving ourselves to Him, with all that we have and are. The answer also gives them the real reason why they were now under subjection to Caesar: viz. because they had fallen from their allegiance to God. 'The question was as if an adulterer were to ask, whether it were lawful for him to pay the penalty of his adultery.' (Claudius, cited by Stier ii. 388.) They had again and again rejected their theocratic inheritance;—they refused it in the wilderness;—they would not have God to reign over them, but a king;—therefore were they subjected to foreigners (see 2 Chron. xii. 8).

23—33.] REPLY TO THE SADDUCEES RESPECTING THE RESURRECTION. Mark xii. 18—27. Luke xx. 27—40. From Acts xxiii. 8, the Sadducees denied resurrection, angel, and spirit; consequently the immortality of the soul, as well as the resurrection of the body. This should be borne in mind, as our Lord's answer is directed against both errors. It is a mistake into which many Commentators (including Wordsw. on the authority of Jerome) have fallen, to suppose that the Sadducees recognized only the Pentateuch: they acknowledged the prophets also, and rejected tradition only (see this abundantly proved by Winer, Realwörterbuch, Sadducker).

23. λέγ.] In Luke, οὐ δυνάμει. = οἰσιν λέγουσιν Mark. Here, the art. being absent, we must understand that they came, saying that there was no resurrection: i. e. either, in pursuance of their well-known denial of that doctrine,—or, which is more probable, actually saying, maintaining it against our Lord: viz., in shape and manner following. 24. ἀναστ. σῶμα.] The first-born son of a leviratical marriage was reckoned and registered as the son of the deceased brother.

 cite the strong testimonies of the Prophets, as Isa. xxvi. 19: Ezek. xxxvii.
 1—14: Dan. xii. 2, but says, as in Luke
 (xx. 37), even Moses has shown, &c., leaving those other witnesses to be supplied. The books of Moses were the great and ultimate appeal for all doctrine: and thus the assertion of the Resurrection comes from the very source whence their difficulty had been constructed. On the passage itself, and our Lord's interpretation of it, much has been written. Certain it is that our Lord brings out in this answer a depth of meaning in the words, which without it we could not discover.

 Meyer, in reply to Straus and Hase, finely says, "Our Lord here testifies of the conscious intent of God in speaking the words. God uttered them, He tells us, to Moses, in the consciousness of the still enduring existence of his peculiar relation to Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob." The groundwork of His argument seems to me to be this:—the words 'I am thy God' imply a covenant; there is another side to them: "thou art Mine" follows upon "I am thine." When God therefore declares that He is the God of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, He declares their continuance, as the other parties in this covenant. It is an assertion which could not be made of an annihilated being of Stier (after Lavater) remarks that this is a weighty testimony against the so-called 'sleep of the soul' in the intermediate state. Compare πάντες γὰρ αὐτῷ ζῶσιν Luke xx. 38. Thus the burden of the Law, 'I AM THE LORD THY GOD,' contains in it the seed of immortality and the hope of the resurrection.

34—40.] REPLY CONCERNING THE GREAT COMMANDMENT. Mark xii. 28—34. In the more detailed account of Mark (Luke has a similar incident in another place, x. 25), this question does not appear as that of one maliciously tempting our Lord: and his seems to me the view to be taken,—as there could not be any evil consequences to our Lord, whichever way He had answered the question. 41—46.] THE PHARISES BAFFLED BY A QUESTION RESPECTING CHRIST AND

 DAVID. Mark xii. 35—37. Luke xx. 41—44. [See also Acts ii. 34.] Our Lord now questions his adversaries (according to Matt.:—in Mark and Luke He asks the question not to, but concerning the Scribes or interpreters of the law), and again convicts them of ignorance of the Scriptures. From the universally recognized title of the Messiah as the Son of David, which by His question He elicits from them, He takes occasion to shew them, who understood this title in a mere worldly political sense, the difficulty arising from David's own reverence for this his Son: the solution lying in the incarnate Godhead of the Christ, of which they were ignorant. 43. εν πνεύμ.] by the inspiration of the Holy Spirit; = εν πρ. άγιω Mark. This is a weighty declaration by our Lord of the inspiration of the prophetic Scriptures. The expression was a rabbinical one: see Schöttgen in loc.

 Mark (ver. 37) adds to this "the common people heard him gladly." Here then end the endeavours of His adversaries to en-trap Him by questions: they now betake themselves to other means. 'Nona de-hinc quasi scena se pandit.' Bengel.

CHAP. XXIII. 1—39.] DENUNCIATION OF THE SCRIBES AND PHARISES. Peculiar to Matthew.

1.] Much of the matter of this discourse is to be found in Luke xi. and xii. On its appearance there, see the notes on those passages. There can, I think, be no doubt that it was delivered, as our Evangelist here relates it, all at one time, and in these the last days of our Lord's ministry. On the notion entertained by some recent critics, of St.
 Matthew having arranged the scattered sayings of the Lord into longer discourses, see Prolegomena to Matthew. A trace of this discourse is found in Mark xii. 38—40: Luke xx. 45—47. In the latter place it is spoken to the disciples, in hearing of the crowd: which (see ver. 8 ff.) is the exact account of the matter. It bears many resemblances to the Sermon on the Mount, and may be regarded as the solemn close, as that was the opening, of the Lord's public teaching. It divides itself naturally into three parts: (1) introductory description of the Scribes and Pharisees, and contrast to Christ's disciples (vv. 1—12): (2) solemn denunciations of their hypocrisy (vv. 14—33): (3) conclusion, and mournful farewell to the temple and Jerusalem. 2.] Moses' seat is the office of judge and lawgiver of the people: see Exod. ii. 13—25: Deut. xvii.

 9—13. Our Lord says, 'In so far as the Pharisees and Scribes enforce the law and precepts of Moses, obey them: but imitate not their conduct.' ἐκάθισαν must not be pressed too strongly, as conveying blame,—'have seated themselves';—it is merely stated here as a matter of fact.
 Vv. 8, 10 however apply to their leadership as well as their faults; and declare that among Christians there are to be none sitting on the seat of Christ.

3. ὥσπερ οὖν δεῖ αὐ] The οὖν here is very significant:—because they sit on Moses' seat: and this clears the meaning, and shows it to be, 'all things which they, as successors of Moses, out of his law, command you to observe, do'; there being a distinction between their lawful teaching

as expounders of the law, and their frivolous traditions superadded thereto, and blamed below.

τηρεῖτε, observe, having respect
 to them as a constant rule of conduct.
 The present binds on the habitual practice to the mere momentary act of the aorist.

4.] The warning was, imitate them not—for they do not themselves what they enjoin on others. And this verse must be strictly connected with ver. 3. The φορτία then are not, as so often misinterpreted (even by Olshausen,
 i. 834), human traditions and observances, but the severity of the law, which they enforce on others, but do not observe (see Rom. ii. 21—23): answering to the βαρύ-τερα τοῦ νόμου of ver. 23. The irksomeness and unbearableness of these rites did not belong to the Law in itself, as rightly explained, but were created by the rigour and ritualism of these men, who followed the letter and lost the spirit: 'omnem operam impendebant (says Grotius) ritibus urgendis et ampliandis.'

τῷ δεκ. αὐτῶν, not αὐτῶν: the emphasis is not on the pronoun, but on the δακτύλῳ.
 As a general rule, when the pron. is simply reflexive, the smooth breathing should always be printed. 5—7.] But what-

 on them, and worn on the forehead be-the text was given because they were con-

 tion is against loving, and in any religious matter, using such titles, signifying dominion over the faith of others. It must be understood in the spirit and not in the letter. Paul calls Timotheus his 'son' in the faith, 1 Tim. i. 2, and exhorts the Corinthians (1 Cor. xi. 1) to be followers of him as he of Christ. To understand and follow such commands in the slavery of the letter, is to fall into the very Pha-

 ing the caution. See (e.g.) Barnes's note here. ραββι = 'r, my master: an expression used, and reduplicated as here, never called by their own name by their scholars. So the Lord says, John xiii. 13,

 Schöttgen, Hor. Heb. ii. 900. The Teacher promise was only given in private to the disciples. If this be so, we have God, in whom they can rest or depend. They are all brethren: all substantially equal—none by office or precedence nearer to God than another; none standing between his brother and God. ‘And the duty of all Christian teachers is to bring their hearers to the confession of the Samaritans in John iv. 42: οὐαὶ διὰ τὴν σὴν λαλίαν πιστεύουσιν· αὐτοὶ γὰρ ἀκηκόαμεν, καὶ οἶδαμεν ὅτι οὗτός ἐστιν ἀληθὺς ὁ σωτὴρ τοῦ κόσμου.’ (Olahausen, Christus der einige Erlöser, p. 10, cited by Stier, ii. 444.) πατέρα μὴ κ. τ.μ., name not any Father of you on earth: no ‘Abba’ or ‘Papa’ (see the account of the funeral of John Wesley, Coke and More’s Life, p. 441, and the opening of the Author’s dedication of the book). 11.] It may serve to shew us how little the letter of a precept has to do with its true observance, if we reflect that he who of all the Heads of sects has most notably violated this whole command, and caused others to do so, calls himself ‘servus servorum Dei.’

13.] This often-repeated saying points here not only to the universal character of God’s dealings, but to the speedy humiliation of the lofty Pharisees; and as such finds a most striking parallel in Ezek. xxi. 26, 27. 14.] In Luke xi. 52 it is added ἔφατε τὴν κλεῖδα τῆς γνώσεως—the Key being, not the Key of, i. e. admitting to, Knowledge, but the Knowledge itself, the true simple interpretation of Scripture which would have admitted them, and caused them to admit others, into the Kingdom of Heaven by the recognition of Him of whom the Scriptures testify; whereas now by their perverse interpretations they had shut out both themselves and others from it. See a notable instance of this latter in John ix. 24. They shut the door as it were in men’s faces who were entering. On the interpolated ver. 13, see notes in Mark (xii. 40).

15.] And with all this betrayal of your trust as οἱ διδάσκαλοι τοῦ Ἰσραὴλ (John iii. 10), as if all your work at home were done, γε πεπαιγ. τ. θ. κ.τ.λ. This was their work of supererogation—not commanded them, nor in the spirit of their law. The Lord speaks not here of those pious Godfearing men, who were found dwelling among the Jews, favouring and often attending their worship—but of the proselytes of righteousness, so called, who by persuasion of the Pharisees, took on them the whole Jewish law and its observances. These were rare—and it was to the credit of our nature that they were. For what could such a proselyte, made by such teachers, become? A disciple of hypocrisy merely—neither a sincere heathen nor a sincere Jew—doubly the child of hell—condemned by the religion which he had left—condemned again by that which he had taken. The expression διπλοτερον ὑμῶν occurs in the same connexion, and probably in allusion to this passage, in Justin Martyr, Tryph., § 122,

 p. 215, οἱ δὲ προεῆλθοι οὐ μόνον οὐ πιστεύουσιν, ἀλλὰ διπλοτερον ὑμῶν βλασφημοῦσιν εἰς τὸ ὄνομα αὐτοῦ.
 16—22.] The Lord forbade all swearing to His own disciples, ch. v. 34; and by the very same reasoning—because every oath is really and eventually an oath by God—shews these Pharisees the validity and solemnity of every oath. "This subterfuge became notorious at Rome. 'Ecce negas, jurasque mihi per templa Tonantis;

Non credo: jura, verpe, per Anchialum' = am chai aloh (as God liveth). Martial xi. 94" (F. M.). The gold here is probably not the ornamental gold, but the Corban—the sacred treasure. (This Meyer doubts, because the question here is not of oaths. But in the absence of any examples of an oath by the gold of the temple, it is just as likely as the other interpretation.) They were fools and blind, not to know and see, that no inanimate thing can witness an oath, but that all these things are called in to do so because of sanctity belonging to them, of which God is the primary source—the order likewise of the things hallowed, being, in their foolish estimate of them, reversed: for the gold must be less than the temple which hallowes it, and the gift than the altar—not as if this were of any real consequence, except to shew their folly—for vv. 20—22, every oath is really an oath by God. But these men were servants only of the temple (ὁ οἶκος ὑμῶν, ver. 38) and the altar, and had forgotten God. ὀφείλει, is bound (see Exod.

οικοδοῦναι) is remarkable: God did not then dwell in the Temple, nor had He done so since the Captivity. [This may perhaps be so: but grammatically it is hardly probable. Rather should I say now, with Meyer, that the aor. refers to the one definite act by which God took possession of the temple as His dwelling-place on its dedication by Solomon; without any allusion to present circumstances. 1862.] 23, 24.] It was doubtful, whether Levit. xxvii. 30 applied to every smallest garden herb: but the Pharisees, in their over-rigidity in externals, stretched it to this, letting go the heavier, more difficult, and more important (see ver. 4) matters of the Law. In the threefold enumeration, our Lord refers to Micah vi. 8 (see also Hosea xii. 6)—where to do justly, to love mercy, and to walk humbly with God, are described as being better than all offerings. ταῦτα—these last, are the great points on which your exertions should have (ἵδε, oportebat) been spent—and then, if for the sake of these they be observed, the others should not be neglected. Stier gives an instance of this, in (Scripture) philology, which if it be applied in subjection to a worthy appreciation of the sense and spirit of the Writer, may profitably descend to the minutest details: but if the philologist begin and end with his 'micrology,' he incurs the μωροὶ καὶ τυφλοὶ of the Pharisees (ii. 515, edn. 1). διυλίζοντες τ. κ.] The straining the gnat, is not a mere proverbial saying. The Jews (as do now the Buddhists in Ceylon and Hindostan) strained their wine, &c., carefully, that they might not violate Levit. xi. 20, 23, 41, 42 (and, it might be added, Levit. xvii. 10—14). The "strain at a gnat" in our present auth. vers. for "strain out a gnat" of the earlier English vss., seems not to have been a mistake, as sometimes supposed, but a deliberate alteration, meaning, "strain [out the wine] at [the occurrence of] a gnat." τὸν and τῇν indicate reference to a proverb or fable. The camel is not only opposed, as of immense size, but is also joined with the other, as being equally unclean. 25—28.] This woe is founded not on a literally, but a typically denoted practice of the Pharisees.

Our Lord, in the ever-deepening denunciation of His discourse, has now arrived at the delineation of their whole character and practices by a parabolic similitude. γέμουσιν ἐξ] not, 'are filled by' (Dr. Burton), but, are full of: τοῦ γνῶ in Hebrew. The straining out of the gnat is a cleansing pertaining to the ἐξωθεν, as compared with the inner composition of the wine itself, of which the cup is full: see Rev. xviii. 3. [ἵνα γὰρ.] The exterior is not in reality pure when the interior is foul: it is not 'a clean cup,' unless both exterior and interior be clean: 'alias enim illa mundities externa non est mundities.' Bengel. Observe, the emphasis is on γίνεσθαι: "that its exterior also may not appear to be, but really become, pure." τὰ φ. κενον.] The Jews used once a year (on the fifteenth of the month Adar) to whitewash the spots where graves were, that persons might not be liable to uncleanness by passing over them (see Num. xix. 16). This goes to the root of the mischief at once: 'your heart is not a temple of the living God, but a grave of pestilent corruption: not a heaven, but a hell. And your religion is but the whitewash—hardly skin-deep.' 29—33.] The guilt resting on these present Pharisees, from being the last in a progressive series of generations of such hypocrites and persecutors, forms the matter of the last Woe. The burden of this hypocrisy is, that they, being one with their fathers, treading in their steps, but vainly disavowing their deeds, were, by the very act of building the sepulchres of the prophets, joined with their prophet-persecuting acts, convicting themselves of continuity with their fathers' wickedness. See, as clearly setting forth this view, Lake xi.

47, 48. '(Sit licet divus, dummodo non vivus). Instead of the penitent confession, "We have sinned, we and our fathers," this last and worst generation in vain protests against their participation in their fathers' guilt, which they are meanwhile developing to the utmost, and filling up its measure (Acts vii. 52). Stier (ii. 453). Again notice the emphasis, which is now markedly on οἱ; thus bringing out that relation in all its fulness and consequences. επληρώσατε, imper., fill ye also (as well as they) the measure (of iniquity) of your fathers. Ver. 33 repeats almost verbatim the first denunciation of the Baptist—in this, the last discourse of the Lord: thus denoting the unchanged state of these men, on whom the whole preaching of repentance had now been expended. One weighty difference however there is: then it was, τίς ἠρᾶσαίεν ὑμῖν φρεῖν; the wonder was, how they bethought themselves of escaping—now, πῶς φύγητε; how shall ye escape! On 54*εις*, see Rev. xii. 9. 34.] From the similar place in the former discourse (Luke xi. 49, see notes there) it would appear that the ὅς ὅτι refers to the whole last denunciation: 'quæ cum ita sint'—since ye are bent upon filling up the iniquities of your fathers, in God's inscrutable purposes ye shall go on rejecting His messengers.' Notice the difference between ἡ σοφία τοῦ θ. in Luke xi. 49, and ἐγώ, with its emphasis here. These words are no where written in Scripture, nor is it necessary to suppose that to be our Lord's meaning. He speaks this as Head of His Church, of those whom He was about to send: see Acts xiii. 1: 1 Cor. xii. 8: Eph. iii. 5. He cannot, as some (Olah.) think, include Himself among those whom He sends—the Jews may have crucified many Christian teachers before the destruction of Jerusalem. And see Euseb. H. E. iii. 32, where he relates from Hegesippus the crucifixion of Symeon son of Clopas, in the reign of Trajan. The καὶ takes out the σταυρώσατε, the special, from the ἀποκτενεῖτε, the general; with, of course, somewhat of emphasis. The προφῆτας were the Apostles, who, in relation to the Jews, were such—the σοφοί, Stephen and such like, men full of the Holy Ghost—the γραμματεῖς, Apollos, Paul (who indeed was all of these together), and such. On μαστ. ἐν τ. συν. κ.τ.λ. see Acts v. 40; xxii. 19; xxvi. 11. 35.] ὅπως, not 'in such a way that' (?), as Webst. and Wilk.: but strictly 'in order that'

αἷμα ὅς or ἀθῖον is a common expression in the O. T. See 4 Kings xxi. 16; xxiv. 4: Jer. xxxiii. (xxvi.) 15; and more especially Lam. iv. 13, which perhaps our Lord referred to in speaking this. πάν αἷ.] Thus in Babylon, Rev. xviii. 24, is found the blood of all that were slain upon the earth. Every such signal judgment is the judgment for a series of long-crying crimes—and these judgments do not exhaust God's anger, Isa. ix. 12, 17, 21.

The murder of Abel was the first in the strife between unrighteousness and holiness, and as these Jews represent, in their conduct both in former times and now, the murderer of the first, they must bear the vengeance of the whole in God's day of wrath.

Who Zacharias son of Barachias is has been much disputed. We may conclude with certainty that it cannot be (as Aug. and Greswell suppose) a future Zacharias, mentioned by Josephus, B. J. iv. 5. 4, as son of Baruch, and slain in the temple just before the destruction of Jerusalem—for our Lord evidently speaks of an event past, and never prophesies in this manner elsewhere. Origen has preserved a tradition (in Matth. Comm. Series, 24, vol. iii. p. 846), that Zacharias father of John the Baptist was slain by them in the temple; but in the absence of all other authority, this must be suspected as having arisen from the difficulty of the allusion here. Most likely (see Lightfoot in loc., and note on Luke xi. 49) it is Zacharias the son of Jehoiada, who was killed there, 2 Chron. xxiv. 21, and of whose blood the Jews had a saying, that it never was washed away till the temple was burnt at the captivity.

Βαραχίου does not occur in Luke xi. 51, and perhaps was not uttered by the Lord Himself, but may have been inserted by mistake, as Zacharias the prophet was son of Barachiah, see Zech. i. 1: a circumstance suppressed by Dr. Wordsworth in his elaborate account of the mystical reason of the patronymic being used here, as "signifying Son of the Blessed, which was a name of Christ Himself." See his note.

μετ. τ. ν. κ. τ. θ.] He was killed in the priests' court, where the altar of burnt-offerings was. On ver. 36, see note on ch. xxiv. 34. It is no objection to the interpretation there maintained, that the whole period of the Jewish course of crime is not filled up by it: the death of Abel can by no explanation be brought within its limits or responsibility; and our Lord's saying reaches far deeper than a mere announcement of their responsibility for what they themselves had done. The Jews stood in the central point of God's dealings with men; and as they were the chosen for the election of grace, so, rejecting God and His messengers, they became, in an especial and awful manner, vessels of wrath.

Our Lord mentions this last murder, not as being the last even before His own day, but because it was connected specially with the cry of the dying man, 'The Lord look upon it and require it.' Compare Genesis iv. 10. This death of Zacharias was the last in the arrangement of the Hebrew Canon of the O. T., though chronologically that of Urijah, Jer. xxvi. 23, was later.

37.] These words were before spoken by our Lord, Luke xiii. 34: see notes there. On the construction of αὐτῆν, see ref.

πορεύεσθαι must be understood of all the messages of repentance and mercy sent by the prophets, for our Lord's words embrace the whole time comprised in the historic survey of ver. 35, as well as His own ministry. On the similitude, see Deut. xxxii. 11: Pa. xvii. 8; xxxvi. 7; lvii. 1; lxi. 4: Isa. xxxi. 5: Mal. iv. 2, σαλήμ, which is Luke's more frequent

 This is to be accounted for by these verses to be spurious and inserted out of Luke, as Wieseler has done, Chronolog. Synops.

τιν ἂν ἴτε παρασχεῖν τοῖς προσελθοῦσιν.
 There is no difficulty in οὐ here used interrogatively. See a similar case John vi.
 70. Meyer has abandoned his former view that we should read οὐ, "where ye see, &c.," and takes the common interpretation. He notices some curious renderings in his note: "Do not look (so wonderingly)
 on . . . (μὴ βλ.)" Paulus: "Do ye not wonder at . . .?" Chrys., al., and De W.: "Ye see not all this . . ." viz. not the desolation that shall come. Grulich, de loci Matt. xxiv. 1, 2, interp. Torg. 1839:
 "Ye do not see: all this, I say to you, shall not . . ." Bornemann. 3.]

From Mark we learn, that it was Peter and James and John and Andrew who asked this question. With regard to the question itself, we must, I think, be careful not to press the clauses of it too much,
 so as to make them bear separate meanings corresponding to the arrangements of our Lord's discourse. As expressed in the other Evangelists, the question was concerning the time, and the sign, of these things happening, viz. the overthrow of the temple and desolation of Judæa, with which, in the then idea of the Apostles, our Lord's coming and the end of the world were connected. Against this mistake He warns them, vv. 6, 14,—Luke ver. 24,—and also in the two first parables in our ch. xxv. For the understanding of this necessarily difficult prophetic discourse, it must be borne in mind that the whole is spoken in the pregnant language of prophecy, in which various fulfil-ments are involved. (1) The view of the Jewish Church and its fortunes as repre- senting the Christian Church and its history, is one key to the interpretation of this chapter. Two parallel interpretations run through the former part as far as ver. 28; the destruction of Jerusalem and the final judgment being both enwrapped in the words, but the former,

 in this part of the chapter, predominating.
 Even in this part, however, we cannot tell how applicable the warnings given may be to the events of the last times, in which apparently Jerusalem is again to play so distinguished a part. From ver. 28, the lesser subject begins to be swallowed up by the greater, and our Lord's second coming to be the predominant theme, with however certain hints thrown back as it were at the event which was immediately in question: till, in the latter part of the chapter and the whole of the next, the second advent, and, at last, the final judg- ment ensuing on it, are the subjects.

 (2) Another weighty matter for the understanding of this prophecy is, that (see Mark xiii. 32) any obscurity or concealment concerning the time of the Lord's second coming, must be attributed to the right cause, which we know from His own mouth to be, that the divine Speaker Himself, in His humiliation, did not know the day nor the hour. All that He had heard of the Father, He made known unto His disciples (John xv. 15): but that which the Father kept in His own power (Acts
 i. 7), He did not in His abased humanity know. He told them the attendant cir- cumstances of His coming; He gave them enough to guard them from error in supposing the day to be close at hand, and from carelessness in not expecting it as near. (Regarding Scripture prophecy as I do as a whole, and the same great process of events to be denoted by it all, it will be but waste labour to be continually at issue, in the notes of this and the succeeding chapter, with Meyer and others, who hold that the Gospel prophecies are inconsistent in their eschatology with those after the Ascension, and those again with the chili- astic ones of the Apocalypse. How untenable this view is, I hope the following notes will shew; but to be continually meeting it, is the office of polemic, not of exegetic theology.) 4, 5.] Our Lord does not answer the πότε but by admonitions not to be deceived. See a question similarly answered, Luke xiii. 23, 24.

πολλ. γάρ] This was the first danger awaiting them: not of being drawn away from Christ, but of imagining that these persons were Himself. Of such persons, before the destruction of Jerusalem, we have no distinct record; doubtless there were such: but (see above) I believe the prophecy and warning to have a further reference to the latter times in which its complete fulfilment must be looked for. The persons usually cited as fulfilling this (Theudas, Simon Magus, Barchochab, &c.) are all too early or too late, and not correspondent to the condition, ἐπὶ τῷ ὀνόματι, 'with My name as the ground of their pretences.' See Greswell on the Parables, v. 380 note. Luke gives an addition (ver. 8) to the speech of the false Christa, καὶ ὁ καιρὸς ἤγγισεν.

6—8.] πόλεμοι and ἀκοαὶ πολέμων there certainly were during this period; but the prophecy must be interpreted rather of those of which the Hebrew Christians would be most likely to hear as a cause of terror. Such undoubtedly were the three threats of war against the Jews by Caligula, Claudius, and Nero; of the first of which Josephus says, Antt. xix. 1. 2, ἵσθαι τε τῷ ἡμετέρῳ δόδε εἰς ὀλίγον ἐξεγερθῆναι μὴ οὐκ ἀπολωλῆναι, μὴ ταχέως αὐτῷ (Γαίῃ) τελειυτῆς παραγενόμενης. Luke couples with πολ., ἀκαταστασίας,—and to this ἔθνος ἐπὶ ἔθνος seems also to point. There were serious disturbances,—(1) at Alexandria, which gave rise to the complaint against and deposition of Flaccus, and Philo's work against him (A.D. 38), in which the Jews as a nation were the especial objects of persecution; (2) at Seleucia about the same time (Josephus, Antt. xviii. 9. 8, 9), in which more than 50,000 Jews were killed; (3) at Jamnia, a city on the coast of Judaea near Joppa (Philo, legat. ad Caium, § 80). Many other such national tumults are recorded by Josephus. See especially B. J. ii. 17. 10, 18. 1—8, in the former of which places, he calls the sedition προσημίων ἀλώσεως, and says that Ἰσκαριὸς τῶν μετρίων ἱερεράρετο: and adds, διενῆ δὲ ἄλην τὴν Συρίαν ἐπίσχευε παραχῇ, καὶ πᾶσα πόλις εἰς δύο διήρητο στρατόκτιδα. λιμός, and λοιμός, which is coupled to it in || Luke, are usual companions: a proverb says, μετὰ λιμὸν λοιμός. With regard to the first, Greswell (vol. v. p. 260 note) shews that the famine prophesied of in the Acts (xi. 28) happened in the ninth of Claudius, A.D. 49. It was great at Rome,—and therefore probably Egypt and Africa, on which the Romans depended so much for supplies, were themselves much affected by it. Suetonius (Claud. 18) speaks of assidua sterilitates; and Tacitus (Ann. xii. 48) of 'frugum egestas, et orta ex eo fames,' about the same time. There was a famine in Judaea in the reign of Claudius (the true date of which however Mr. Greswell believes (Diss. vol. ii. p. 6) to be the third of Nero), mentioned by Josephus, Antt. iii. 16. 3. And as to λοιμοί, though their occurrence might, as above, be inferred from the other, we have distinct accounts of a pestilence at Rome (A.D. 65) in Suetonius, Nero 39, and Tacitus, Ann. xvi. 18, which in a single autumn carried off 80,000 persons at Rome. But such matters

2 Cor. xi. 13. Even De Wette, who attempts to deny the historical fulfilment of the former signs (ver. 7), confesses that this was historically fulfilled (Exeget. Handbuch in loc.). 13.] It is against this ἀνομία especially that James, in his Epistle, and Jude, in more than the outward sense the brother of James, were called on to protest,—the mixture of heathen licentiousness with the profession of Christianity. But perhaps we ought to have regard to the past tense of πληθυν-θῆναι, and interpret, ‘because the iniquity is filled up,’ on account of the horrible state of morality (parallel to that described by Thucydides, iii. 82—84, as prevailing in Greece, which had destroyed all mutual confidence), the love and mutual trust of the generality of Christians shall grow cold. τῶν πολλῶν,—thus we have ch. xiv. 5, ἐνέσταζαν πᾶσαι καὶ ἐαθεῖν. Even the Church itself is leavened by the distrust of the evil days. See 2 Thess. ii. 3. 13.] The primary meaning of this seems to be, that whosoever remained faithful till the destruction of Jerusalem, should be preserved from it. No Christian, that we know of, perished in the siege or after it: see below. But it has ulterior meanings, according to which ρίλος will signify, to an individual, the day of his death (see Rev. ii. 10),—his martyrdom, as in the case of some of those here addressed,—to the Church, endurance in the faith to the end of all things. See Luke, xxi. 19, and note.

14.] We here again have the pregnant meaning of prophecy. The Gospel had been preached through the whole ‘orbis terrarum,’ and every nation had received its testimony, before the destruction of Jerusalem: see Col. i. 6, 23: 2 Tim. iv. 17. This was necessary not only as regarded the Gentiles, but to give to God’s people the Jews, who were scattered among all these nations, the opportunity of receiving or rejecting the preaching of Christ. But in the wider sense, the words imply that the Gospel shall be preached in all the world, literally taken, before the great and final end come. The apostasy of the latter days, and the universal dispersion of missions, are the two great signs of the end drawing near.

15. βδέλυγ. τ. ἐρημ.] The LXX rendering and that of Theod. (vat. omits τῆς) of οὐδὲ γὰρ, Dan. xii. 11. The similar expression in ch. xi. 31, is rendered in the same manner by the LXX, but by Theod. βδέλ. ἡφανισμένων, and in ch. ix. 27, τὸ βδέλ. τὸν λομύσεων in the Vat. MS., and altogether differently in the Alex. To what exactly the words in Daniel apply, is not clear. Like other prophecies, it is probable that they are pregnant with several interpretations, and are not yet entirely fulfilled. They were interpreted of Antiochus Epiphanes by the Alexandrine Jews; thus 1 Macc. i. 54 we read ἐκδόρησαν βδέλυγμα ἐρημώσεως ἐπὶ τὸ θεοσαστήριον. Josephus refers the prophecy to the desolation by the Romans: Antt. x. 11. 7, Δανιήλος καὶ περὶ τῆς τῶν Ῥωμαίων ἡγεμονίας ἀνέγραψε, καὶ οὗ ἐκ’ αὐτῶν ἐρημώθησεται. The principal Commentators have supposed, that the eagles of the Roman legions are meant, which were βδέλυγμα, inasmuch as they were idols worshipped by the soldiers. These, they say, stood in the holy place, or a holy place, when the Roman armies encamped round Jerusalem under Cestius Gallus first, A.D. 68, then under Vespasian, A.D. 68, then lastly under Titus, A.D. 70. Of these the first is generally taken as the sign meant. Josephus relates, B. J. ii. 20, 1, that after Cestius was defeated, πολλοὶ τῶν ἐπιφανῶν Ἰουδαίων, ὥς περ βαπτίζομένης νέας, ἀνυπόχοντο τῆς πόλεως. But, without denying that this time was that of the sign being given, I believe that all such interpretations of its meaning are wholly inapplicable. The error has mainly arisen from supposing that the parallel warning of Luke (ver. 20, ὅταν δὲ ἰδῇτε κνῦλον-μένην ὑπὸ στρατοπέδῳ 'Ier. τότε γινώτε ὅτι ἡγγικεν ἡ ἱερήμωσις αὐτῆς) is identical in meaning with our text and that of Mark. The two first evangelists, writing for Jews, or as Jews, give the inner or domestic sign of the approaching calamity: which was to be seen in the temple, and was to be the abomination (always used of something caused by the Jews themselves, see 2 Kings xxi. 2—7: Ezek. v. 11; vii. 8, 9; viii. 6—16) which should cause the desolation,—the last drop in the cup of iniquity. Luke, writing for Gentiles, gives the outward state of things corresponding to this inward sign. That the Roman eagles cannot be meant, is apparent: for the sign would thus be no sign, the Roman eagles having been seen on holy ground for many years past, and at the very moment when these words were uttered. Also τόπος ἅγιος must mean the temple: see reff.

Now in searching for some event which may have given such alarm to the Christians, Josephus's unconscious admission (B. J. iv. 6. 3) is important: ἦν γὰρ δὴ τις παλαιὸς λόγος ἀνδρῶν, ἔνθα τότε τὴν πόλιν ἀλώσεσθαι, καὶ καταφλεγῆσθαι τὰ ἅγια νόμῳ πολέμου, στάσις ἰδὼν κατασκήψῃ, καὶ χεῖρες οἰκταὶ προμάνωσι τὸ τοῦ θεοῦ τίμιον· οἷς οὐκ ἀπιστήσαντες οἱ ζηλωταὶ διακόνουσιν ἑαυτοὺς ἐπίδοσαν. The party of the Zelots, as we learn from ib. ch. 3. 6, 7, had taken possession of the temple,—τὸν νῆον τοῦ θ. φρουρίον αὐτοῖς ποιοῦνται, καὶ καταφυγὴ καὶ τυραννίδιον αὐτοῖς ἦν τὸ ἔργον. In the next section (8) he tells us that they chose one Phannius as their high-priest, an ignorant and profane fellow, brought out of the field,—ὥς περ ἐπὶ σηνῆς ἀλλοτριῷ κατεκόσμου προσηπίψ, τὴν τε ἱσθῆτα περιθύντες ἱεράν, καὶ τὸ τὴν δαΐ ποιῖν ἐπὶ καιροῦ διδάσκοντες,—χλεύη δ' ἦν ἱερεῖς καὶ παῖδι τὸ τηλεούτων ἀσίδημα,—τοῖς δὲ ἄλλοις ἱερεῖσιν ἐπιθεωμένοις πόρρωθεν παζόμενον τὸν νόμον σακρῶν ἱγίη, καὶ κατίσινον τὴν τῶν ἱερῶν τιμῶν κατάλυσιν. I own that the above-cited passages strongly incline me to think that if not this very impiety, some similar one, about or a little before this time, was the sign spoken of by the Lord. In its place in Josephus, this very event seems to stand a little too late for our purpose (A.D. 67, a year after the investment by Cestius): but the narrative occurs in a description of the atrocities of the Zelots, and without any fixed date, and they had been in possession of the temple from the very first. So that this or some similar abomination may have about this time filled up the cup of iniquity and given the sign to the Christians to depart. Whatever it was, it was a definite, well-marked event, for the flight was to be immediate, on one day (μηδὲ σαββάτῳ), and universal from all parts of Judæa. Putting then St. Luke's expression and the text together, I think that some internal desecration of the holy place by the Zelots coincided with the approach of Cestius, and thus, both from without and within, the Christians were warned to escape. See Luke xxi. 20: also Dr. Wordsw.'s note here, which however introduces much mystical and irrelevant matter, though coming to what I regard as the right conclusion.

δ ἀπ' αὐτοῦ νοεῖτω] This I believe to have been an ecclesiastical note, which, like the doxology in ch. vi. 13, has found its way into the text. If the two first Gospels were published before the destruction of Jerusalem, such an admonition would be very intelligible. The words may be part of our Lord's discourse directing attention to the prophecy of Daniel (see 2 Tim. ii. 7; Dan. xii. 10); but this is not likely, especially as the reference to Daniel does not occur in Mark, where these words are also found. They cannot well be the words of the Evangelist, inserted to bespeak attention, as this in the three first Gospels is wholly without example. 16—18.] The Christian Jews are said (Euseb. H. E. iii. 5) to have fled to Pella, a town described by Josephus (B. J. iii. 8. 3) as the northernmost boundary of Persæa. Eusebius says they were directed thither by a certain prophetic intimation (τινὰ χρησάν), which however cannot be this; as Pella is not on the mountains, but beyond them (but in order to reach it would not they have to fly exactly ἐπὶ τὰ ὄρη—over, along, across them? See note on ch. xviii. 12).—Epiphanius (de mensuris et pond. § 15, vol. ii. p. 171) that they προεχρηματισθησαν ὑπὸ ἀγγιλου.

17.] A person might run on the flat-roofed houses in Jerusalem from one part of the city to another, and to the city gates. Perhaps however this is not meant, but that he should descend by the outer stairs instead of the inner, which would lose time.

19, 20.] It will be most important that so sudden a flight should not be encumbered, by personal hindrances (τ. ἐν γ. ἑξ.), or by hindrances of accompaniment (τ. θηλ.), see 1 Cor. vii. 26; and that those things which are out of our power to arrange, should be propitious,—weather, and freedom from legal prohibition. The words μηδὲ σαβ. are peculiar to Matthew, and shew the strong Jewish tint which caused him alone to preserve such portions of our Lord's sayings. That they were not said as any sanction of observance of the Jewish Sabbath, is most certain: but merely as referring to the positive impediments which might meet them on that day, the shutting of the gates of cities, &c., and their own scruples about travelling further than the ordinary Sabbath-day's journey (about a mile English); for the Jewish Christians adhered to the law and customary observances till the destruction of Jerusalem.

21, 22.] In ver. 19 there is probably also an allusion to the horrors of the siege, which is here taken up by the γὰρ. See Dent. xxviii. 49—57, which was literally fulfilled in the case of Mary of Perse, related by Josephus, B. J. vi. 3. 4.

Our Lord still has in view the prophecy of Daniel (ch. xii. 1), and this citation clearly shews the intermediate fulfilment, by the destruction of Jerusalem, of that which is yet future in its final fulfilment: for Daniel is speaking of the end of all things. Then only will these words be accomplished in their full sense: although Josephus (but he only in a figure of rhetoric) has expressed himself in nearly the same language (B. J. procem. § 4): τὰ γούν πάντων ἂν αἰῶνος ἀνυχήματα πρὸς τὰ ἰουδαίων ἡγῶσθαι μοι δοκῇ κατὰ σύγερσιν.

22.] If God had not in his mercy shortened (by His decree, to which the aor. refers) those days (ἡμέρας ἐκδικήσεως, Luke xxi. 22) the whole lighting both ends of heaven at once, seen of all beneath it, can only find its full similitude in His Personal coming, Whom every eye shall see, Rev. i. 7. 28.]

The stress is on ὅπου ἐάν and ἐκεῖ, pointing out the universality. In the similar discourse, Luke xvii. 37, before this saying, the disciples ask, 'Where, Lord?' The answer is,—first, at Jerusalem: where the corrupting body lies, thither shall the vultures (literally) gather themselves together, coming as they do from far on the scent of prey. Secondly, in its final fulfilment,—over the whole world;—for that is the πῶμα now, and the δειροί the angels of vengeance. See Deut. xxviii. 49, which is probably here referred to; also Hosea viii. 1: Hab. i. 8. The interpretation (Theophylact, Euthym., Calvin, Dr. Wordsw., &c.) which makes the πῶμα our Lord, and the δειροί the elect, is quite beside the purpose. The mystical defence of it may be seen in Wordsw.'s notes. Neither is any allusion (Lightfoot, Ham., Wetstein, Wolf, &c.) to the Roman eagles to be for a moment thought of. The δειροί are the vultures (vultur percnopterus, Linn.), usually reckoned by the ancients as belonging to the eagle kind, Plin. Nat. Hist. ix. 3. 29.] εὐθέως—all the difficulty which this word has been supposed to involve has arisen from confounding the partial fulfilment of the prophecy with its ultimate one. The important insertion in Luke (xxi. 23, 24) shews us that the θλίψις includes ὁπρὶν τῷ λαῷ τούτῳ, which is yet being inflicted: and the treading down of Jerusalem by the Gentiles, still going on (see note there): and immediately after that tribulation which shall happen when the cup of Gentile iniquity is full, and when the Gospel shall have been preached in all the world for a witness, and rejected by the Gentiles, (πληρωθῶσιν καιροὶ ἰθὺν,) shall the coming of the Lord Himself happen. On the indefiniteness of this assigned period in the prophecy, see note on ver. 3. (The expression in Mark is VOL. I.

equally indicative of a considerable interval; ἐν ἐκείναις ταῖς ἡμέραις μετὰ τὴν θλίψιν ἐκείνην.) The fact of His coming and its attendant circumstances being known to Him, but the exact time unknown, He speaks without regard to the interval, which would be employed in His waiting till all things are put under His feet: see Rev. i. 1; xii. 6—20.

In what follows, from this verse, the Lord speaks mainly and directly of His great second coming. Traces there are (as e. g. in the literal meaning of ver. 34) of slight and indirect allusions to the destruction of Jerusalem;—as there were in the former part to the great events of which that is a foreshadowing;—but no direct mention. The contents of the rest of the chapter may be set forth as follows: (ver. 29) signs which shall immediately precede (ver. 30) the coming of the Lord to judgment, and (ver. 31) to bring salvation to His elect. The certainty of the event, and its intimate connexion with its promonitory signs (vv. 32, 33); the endurance (ver. 34) of the Jewish people till the end—even till Heaven and Earth (ver. 35) pass away. But (ver. 36) of the day and hour none knoweth. Its suddenness (vv. 37—39) and decisiveness (vv. 40, 41),—and exhortation (vv. 42—44) to be ready for it. A parable setting forth the blessedness of the watching, and misery of the neglectful servant (vv. 45—end), and forming a point of transition to the parables in the next chapter. 3 ἡλῖος σκορ.] The darkening of the material lights of this world is used in prophecy as a type of the occurrence of trouble and danger in the fabric of human societies, Isa. v. 30; xiii. 10; xxxiv. 4: Jer. iv. 28: Ezek. xxxii. 7, 8: Amos viii. 9, 10: Micah iii. 6. But the type is not only in the words of the prophecy, but also in the events themselves. Such prophecies are to be understood literally, and indeed without such understanding would lose their truth and significance. The physical signs shall happen (see Joel ii. 31: R the description typifies. The Sun of this world and the church (Mal. iv. 2: Luke i.

 is the Lord Jesus—the Light, is the Knowledge of Him. The moon—human knowledge and science, of which it is said (Ps. xxxvi. 9), 'In thy light shall we see light:' reflected from, and drinking the beams of, the Light of Christ. The stars —see Dan. viii. 10—are the leaders and teachers of the Church. The Knowledge of God shall be obscured—the Truth nigh put out—worldly wisdom darkened—the Church system demolished, and her teachers cast down. And all this in the midst of the fearful signs here (and in Luke, vv.
 25, 26, more at large) recounted: not not, the stars, just mentioned;—nor the angels, spoken of by and by, ver. 31: but most probably the greater heavenly bodies, which rule the day and night, Gen.

 i. 16, and are there also distinguished from the deities,—the λαμπροὶ δαυστραι of Ezech. Agam. init. See notes on 2 Pet.

 included in τὰ στοιχεῖα. Typically, the influences which rule human society, which make the political weather fair or foul, of peace, or inflict the blight and desolation of war. 30.] This τότε, so emphatically placed and repeated, is a definite declaration of time,—not a mere sign of sequence or coincidence, as e. g. in

 ver. 23:—when these things shall have been somehow filling men's hearts with fear,—THEN shall, &c. It is quite uncertain what the σημεῖον shall be:— plainly, not the Son of Man Himself, as some explain it (even Bengel, generally so valuable in his explanations, says, 'Ipse erit signum sui,' and quotes Luke ii. 12 as confirming this view; but there the swaddling clothes and the manger were the 'sign,' not the child), nor any outward marks on his body, as his wounds; for both these would confuse what the prophecy keeps distinct—the seeing of the sign of the Son of Man, and all tribes of the earth mourning, and afterwards seeing the Son of Man Himself. This is manifestly some sign in the Heavens, by which all shall know that the Son of Man is at hand.

 The Star of the Wise Men naturally occurs to our thoughts—but a star would not be a sign which all might read. On the whole I think no sign completely answers the conditions but that of the Cross:— and accordingly we find the Fathers mostly thus explaining the passage. But as our Lord Himself does not answer the question, τί τὸ σημεῖον τῆς σῆς παρουσίας; we may safely leave the matter. I mention, just to shew how sensible expositors can be misled by a false interpretation of the whole, Wetstein's strange paraphrase of solymorum incensorum, qui interdiu solem, seems to favour the reading which inserts καὶ here. wrap., not as E. V., 'a parable,' but the (not, its: the fig-tree may teach many lessons besides this; cf. ref. Matt. Luke) parable,—the natural phenomenon which may serve as a key to the meaning.

This coming of the Lord shall be as sure a sign that the Kingdom of Heaven is nigh, as the putting forth of the tender leaves of the fig-tree is a sign that summer is nigh. Observe πάντα ταῦτα, every one of these things,—this coming of the Son of Man included, which will introduce the millennial Kingdom. As regards the parable,—there is a reference to the withered fig-tree which the Lord cursed: and as that, in its judicial unfruitfulness, emblemized the Jewish people, so here the putting forth of the fig-tree from its state of winter dryness, symbolizes the future reversion of that race, which the Lord (ver. 34) declares shall not pass away till all be fulfilled. That this is the true meaning of that verse, must appear when we recollect that it forms the conclusion of this parable, and is itself joined by παρέλθῃ to the verse following. We cannot, in seeking for its ultimate fulfilment, go back to the taking of Jerusalem and make the words apply to it.

As this is one of the points on which the rationalizing interpreters (De Wette, &c.) lay most stress to shew that the prophecy has failed, it may be well to shew that γενεὰ has in Hellenistic Greek the meaning of a race or family of people. See Jer. viii. 3 LXX; compare ch. xxi. 36 with ib. ver. 35, ἐφενέσκει . . . but this generation did not slay Zacharias—so that the whole people are addressed: see also ch. xii. 45, in which the meaning absolutely requires this sense (see note there): see also Luke xvii. 25; Matt. xvii. 17; Luke xvi. 8, where γενεὰ is predicated both of the οἱ τοῦ αἵματος τοῦτον and the οἱ τοῦ φωτός, Acts ii. 40; Phil. ii. 15. In all these places γενεὰ is = γένος, or nearly so; having it is true a more pregnant meaning, implying that the character of one generation stamps itself upon the race, as here in this verse also.

This meaning of γενεὰ is fully conceded by Dörner; 'omnes reor concessuros, vocem γ. si eam veritas etas, multas easque plane insuperabiles ciere difficultates, contextum vero et orationis progressum flagitare significationem gentis, nempe Judeorum.' (Stier, ii. 502.) The continued use of παράρχουσι in vv. 34, 35, should have saved the Commentators from the blunder of imagining that the then living generation was meant, seeing that the prophecy is by the next verse carried on to the end of all things: and that, as matter of fact, the Apostles and ancient Christians did continue to expect the Lord's coming, after that generation had past away. But, as Stier well remarks, "there are men foolish enough now to say, heaven and earth will never pass away, but the words of Christ pass away in course of time —; of this, however, we wait the proof." ii. 506.

and minute.' The very important addition to this verse in Mark, and in some ancient MSS. here (but see digest), οὐδὲ ὁ υἱος, ὁ νιος, is indeed included in εἰ μὴ ὁ πατήρ μου μόνος, but could hardly have been inferred from it, had it not been expressly stated: ch. xx. 23. All attempts to soften or explain away this weighty truth must be resisted; it will not do to say with some Commentators, 'nescit ea nobis,' which, however well meant, is a mere evasion:—in the course of humiliation undertaken by the Son, in which He increased in wisdom (Luke ii. 52), learned obedience (Heb. v. 8), uttered desires in prayer (Luke vi. 12, &c.),—this matter was hidden from Him: and as I have already remarked, this is carefully to be borne in mind, in explaining the prophecy before us. 37.—39.] This comparison also occurs in Luke xvii. 26, 27, with the addition of 'the days of Lot' to it: see also 2 Pet. ii. 4—10; iii. 5, 6. is expanded at length. Compare ver. 7 there with our ver. 49, and on the distinction between those who are of the day, and those who are of the night, see notes there.

45—47.] Our Lord had given this parabolic exhortation before, Luke xii. 42—43. Many of these His last sayings in public are solemn repetitions of, and references to, things already said by Him. That this was the case in the present instance, is almost demonstrable, from the implicit allusion in Luke xii. 36, to the return from the wedding, which is here expanded into the parable of ch. xxv. 1 ff. How much more natural that our Lord should have preserved in his parabolic discourses the same leading ideas, and again and again gathered his precepts round them,—than that the Evangelists should have thrown into utter and inconsistent confusion, words which would have been treasured up so carefully by them that heard them;—to say nothing of the promised help of the Spirit to bring to mind all that He had said to them.

τις αρα εσν.] A question asked that each one may put it to himself,—and to signify the high honour of such an one. πιστ. κ. φρ.] Prudence in a servant can be only the consequence of faithfulness to his master.

This verse is especially addressed to the Apostles and ministers of Christ. The βιδουαι την τροφήν (= το σιτοματριον Luke xii. 42) answers to εργαζην ανεπισχυοντον, ορθοτομουνα τον λογον της αληθ. in 2 Tim. ii. 15. On ver. 47, compare ch. xxv. 21 : 1 Tim. iii. 18 : Rev. ii. 26 ; iii. 21, which last two passages answer to the promise here, that each faithful servant shall be over all his master's goods. That promotion shall not be like earthly promotion, wherein the eminence of one excludes that of another,—but rather like the diffusion of love, in which, the more each has, the more there is for all.

48—51.] The question is not here asked again, τις εστιν κ.τ.λ., but the transition made from the good to the bad servant, or even the good to the bad mind of the same servant, by the epithet καεος.

On this graphic use of the demonstrative pronoun, see Kühner, Gramm. ii. 325.

χρονιζω.] then manifestly, a long delay is in the mind of the Lord : see above on ver. 29. Notice that this servant also is one set over the household—one who says ο κυριος μου—and began well—but now αφηνται τον, &c.—falls away from his truth and faithfulness;—the sign of which is that he begins (lit. shall have begun) to κατακυριεύειν τον κληρον 1 Pet. v. 8, and to reveal with the children of the world. quence, though he have not lost his belief (ὁ εἶπε. πῶς), he shall be placed with those who believed not, the hypocrites.

51.] ἔρχ. refers to the punishment of cutting, or sawing asunder : see Dan. ii. 5 ; iii. 29 : Sus. ver. 59 : see also Heb. iv. 12 ; xi. 37. The expression here is perhaps not without a symbolical reference to that dreadful sundering of the conscience and practice which shall be the reflective torment of the condemned :—and by the mingling and confounding of which only is the anomalous life of the wilful sinner made in the world tolerable.

CHAP. XXV. 1—13.] PARABLE OF THE VIRGINS. Peculiar to Matthew.

1.] τότε—at the period spoken of at the end of the last chapter, viz. the coming of the Lord to His personal reign—not His final coming to judgment. δέκα

παρ. The subject of this parable is not, as of the last, the distinction between the faithful and unfaithful servants ; no outward distinction here exists—all are virgins—all companions of the bride—all furnished with brightly-burning lamps—all, up to a certain time, fully ready to meet the Bridegroom—the difference consists in some having made a provision for feeding the lamps in case of delay, and the others none—and the moral of the parable is the blessedness of endurance unto the end. 'In eo vertitur summa parabola, quod non satis est ad officium semel accinctos fuisse et paratos, nisi ad finem usque duremus.' Calvin. There is no question here of apostasy, or unfaithfulness—but of the wast of provision to keep the light bright against the coming of the bridegroom however delayed.

Ten was a favourite number with the Jews—ten men formed a congregation in a synagogue. In a passage from Rabbi Salomo, cited by Wetstein, he mentions ten lamps or torches as the usual number in marriage processions : see also Luke xix. 13. εἰς θω. τ. v. It would appear that these virgins had left their own homes, and were waiting somewhere for the bridegroom to come,—probably at the house of the bride ; for the object of the marriage procession was to fetch the bride to the bridegroom's house. Meyer however supposes that in this case the wedding was to be held in the bride's house, on account of the thing signified—the coming of the Lord to his Church ;—but it is better to take the ordinary custom, and interpret accordingly, where we can. In both the wedding parables (see ch. xxii.) the bride does not appear—for she, being the church, is in fact the aggregate of the guests in the one case, and of the companions in the other. We may perhaps say that she is here, in the strict interpretation, the Jewish Church, and these ten virgins Gentile congregations accompanying her. The reading καὶ τῆς νύμφης is probably an interpolation, such as are of frequent occurrence in D and its cognates.

This ἐξῆλθον is not their final going out in ver. 6, for only half of them did so,—but their leaving their own homes: cf. λαβούσαι—ἔλαβον, &c. vv. 3, 4. The interpretation is—these are souls come out from the world into the Church, and there waiting for the coming of the Lord—not hypocrites, but faithful souls, bearing their lamps (r. λ. λαυῶν, cf. 1 Thess. iv. 4)—the inner spiritual life fed with the oil of God's Spirit (see Zech. iv. 2—12; Acts x. 38; Heb. i. 9). All views of this parable which represent the foolish virgins as having only a dead faith, only the lamp without the light, the body without the spirit, &c., are quite beside the purpose;—the lamps (see ver. 8) were all burning at first, and for a certain time.

Whether the equal partition of wise and foolish have any deep meaning we cannot say; it may be so.

3, 4.] These were not torches, nor wicks fastened on staves, as some have supposed, but properly lamps: and the oil vessels (which is most important to the parable) were separate from the lamps. The lamps being the hearts lit with the flame of heavenly love and patience, supplied with the oil of the Spirit,—now comes in the difference between the wise and foolish:—the one made no provision for the supply of this—the others did. How so? The wise ones gave all diligence to make their calling and election sure (2 Pet. i. 10 and 5—8), making their bodies, souls, and spirits (their vessels, 2 Cor. iv. 7) a means of supplying spiritual food for the light within, by seeking, in the appointed means of grace, more and more of God's Holy Spirit. The others did not this—but trusting that the light, once burning, would ever burn, made no provision for the strengthening of the inner man by watchfulness and prayer.

5—7.] χρυσῆς: compare ch. xxiv. 48. But the thought of the foolish virgins is very different from that of the wicked servant: his—'there will be plenty of time, my Lord tarrieth;—theirs, 'surely He will soon be here, there is no need of a store of oil.' This may serve to shew how altogether diverse is the ground of the two parables. ἐν πᾶσι κ. &c.] I believe no more is meant here than that all, being weak by nature, gave way to drowsiness: as indeed the wakefulness of the holiest Christian, compared with what it should be, is a sort of slumber:—but, the while, how much difference was there between them! ἐνύπνιον.] dormitabant: we have Aristoph. Hilary, understands this verse of sleep in death. But, not to mention that this will not fit the machinery of the parable (see below on ver. 8), it would assume (πᾶσαι) that none of the faithful would be living on earth when the Lord comes. κραυγὴ γ.] see Isa. lxii. 5—7: and the porter's duty, Mark xiii. 34. This warning cry is before the coming: see ver. 10. γίγονεν, not, was, but to be rendered present, graphically setting the reality before us: there ariseth a cry. κῶσαι] All now seem alike—all wanted their lamps trimmed—but for the neglectful, there is not wherewith! It is not enough to have burnt, but to be burning, when He comes. Raise the wick as they will, what avails it if the oil is spent? ἐκόσμη-σαν] "by pouring on fresh oil, and removing the fungi about the wick: for the latter purpose a sharp-pointed wire was attached to the lamp, which is still seen in the byzantine lamps found in sepulchres. 8, 9.] εἶ, are going out,—not as E. V., and even recently Dr. Wordsworth to support his interpretation of ver. 5,—'are gone out?' and there is deep truth in this: the lamps of the foolish virgins are not extinguished altogether.

μή. οὐ μὴ ἄρ.] see Ps. xlix. 7; Rom. xiv. 12. No man can have more of this provision than will supply his own wants. πορεύεσθε] This is not said in mockery, as some (Luther, Calvin) suppose: but in earnest. οἱ πωλοῦντες are the ordinary dispensers of the means of grace—ultimately of course God Himself, who alone can give his Spirit. The counsel was good, and well followed—but the time was past. (Observe that those who sell are a particular class of persons—no mean argument for a set and appointed ministry—and moreover for a paid ministry. If they sell, they receive for the thing sold: cf. our Lord's saying, Luke x. 7. This selling bears no analogy with the crime of Simon Magus in Acts viii.: cf. our Lord's other saying, Matt. x. 8.) 10—12.] We are not told that they could not buy—that the shops were shut—but simply that it was too late—for that time. For it is not the final coming of the Lord to judgment, when the day of grace will be past, that is spoken of,—except in so far as it is hinted at in the background, and in the individual application of the parable (virtually, not actually) coincides, to each man, with the day of his death. xix. 7—9 (see also ib. xxi. 2); after which these improvident ones gone to buy their oil shall be judged in common with the rest of the dead, ibid. vv. 12, 13. Observe here, οὐκ οἶδα ὑμᾶς is very different, as the whole circumstances are different, from οὐδὲ οἶδα ἡμῶν in ch. vii. 23, where the ἀποκριθεὶς ἀπ' ἐμοῦ binds it to the πορεύεσθε ἀπ' ἐμοῦ in our ver. 41, and to the time of the final judgment, spoken of in that parable. [See the note at the end of the chapter.]

14—30.] PARABLE OF THE TALENTS. Peculiar to Matthew. The similar parable contained in Luke xix. 11—27 is altogether distinct, and uttered on a different occasion: see notes there. 14.] Σπ. v.—the ellipsis is rightly supplied in the E. V., For the Kingdom of Heaven is as a man, &c. We have this parable and the preceding one alluded to in very few words by Mark, xiii. 34—36. In it we have the active side of the Christian life, and its danger, set before us, as in the last the contemplative side. There, the foolish virgins failed from thinking their part too easy—here the wicked servant fails from thinking his too hard. The parable is still concerned with Christians (τοὺς ἱδόντες δούλους), and not the world at large.

We must remember the relation of master and slave, in order to understand his delivering to them his property, and punishing them for not fructifying with it.

15.] In Luke each receives the same, but the profit made by each is different: see notes there. Here, in fact, they did each receive the same, for they received according to their ability—their character and powers. There is no Pelagianism in this, for each man's powers are themselves the gift of God. 16—18.] The increase gained by each of the two faithful servants was the full amount of their talents:—of each will be required as much as has been given.

"εργάσατο is the technical term, common in the classics, and especially in Demosthenes: see Reiske's index. ἐν is instrumental." Meyer. ἐτελεσεν is not a Latinism (conficere pecuniam), but answers to ποιεῖν καρπὸν ch. iii. 10. The third servant here is not to be confounded with the wicked servant in ch. xiv. 48. This one is not actively an ill-doer, but a hider of the money entrusted to him—one who brings no profit: see on ver. 24. 19—23.]

in Luke (xix. 23) ἐπὶ τράπεζαν. τραπέζιτης is interpreted κολλυβιστής (see ch. xxi. 12) by Hesychius. There was a saying very current among the early Fathers, γίνεσθε δόκιμοι τραπέζιται, which some of them seem to attribute to the Lord, some to one of the Apostles. It is supposed by some to be taken from this place, and it is just possible it may have been: but it more likely was traditional, or from some apocryphal gospel. Suicer, Thes., under the word, discusses the question, and inclines to think that it was a way of expressing the general moral of the two parables in Matt. and Luke. But, in the interpretation, who are these τραπέζιται? The explanation (Olah., and day of judgment. Compare for the better understanding of the distinction, and connexion of these 'two comings' of the Lord, 1 Thess. iv. 16, 17, and 2 Thess. i. 7—10.

This description is not a parable, though there are in it parabolic passages, e. g. ὥσπερ ὁ ποιμ. κ.ρ.λ.: and for that very reason, that which is illustrated by those likenesses is not itself parabolic. It will heighten our estimation of the wonderful sublimity of this description, when we recollect that it was spoken by the Lord only three days before His sufferings. ἐν τῇ 86ῃ. αὐτ.] This expression, repeated again at the end of the verse, is quite distinct from μινδ δυνάμ. κ. δόξ. πολλῆς ch. xxiv. 30; see Rev. xx. 11. This His glory is that also of all his saints, with whom He shall be accompanied: see Jude, ver. 14. In this his coming they are with the angels, and as the angels: see Rev. xiv. 14 (compare ver. 8): Zech. xiv. 5.

32.] The expression πάντα τὰ ἔθνη implies all the nations of the world, as distinguished from the ἑλεστροί already gathered to Him, just as the Gentiles were by that name distinguished from his chosen people the Jews. Among these are "the other sheep which He has, not of this fold," John x. 16. ἀφοριεῖ κ.ρ.λ.] see Ezek. xxxiv. 17. The sheep are those referred to in Rom. ii. 7, 10; the goats in ib. vv. 8, 9, where this same judgment according to works is spoken of. 34.] THE δεῦτε κ.ρ.λ.] Whatever of good these persons had done, was all from Him from whom cometh every good gift—and the fruit of his Spirit. And this Spirit is only purchased for man by the work of the Son, in whom the Father is well pleased: and to whom all judgment is committed. And thus they are the blessed of the Father, and those for whom this kingdom is prepared. It is not to the purpose to say that those εὐλογημ. . . . must be the elect of God in the stricter sense (οἱ ἑλεστροί)—and that, because the Kingdom has been prepared for them from the foundation of the world. For evidently this would, in the divine omniscience, be true of every single man who shall come to salvation, whether belonging to those who shall be found worthy to share the first resurrection or not. The Scripture assures us of two resurrections: the first, of the dead in Christ, to meet Him and reign with Him, and hold (1 Cor. vi. 2) judgment over the world; the second, of all the dead, to be judged according to their works. And to what purpose would be a judgment, if all were to be condemned? And if any escape condemnation, to them might the words of this verse be used: so that this objection to the interpretation does not apply.

37—40.] The answer of these δι-καιοι appears to me to shew plainly (as Olshausen and Stier interpret it) that they are not to be understood as being the covenanted servants of Christ. Such an answer it would be impossible for them to make, who had done all distinctly with reference to Christ, and for his sake, and with his declaration of ch. x. 40—42 before them. Such a supposition would remove all reality, as indeed it has generally done, from our Lord's description. See the remarkable difference in the answer of the faithful servants, vv. 20, 22. The saints are already in His glory—judging the world with Him (1 Cor. vi. 2)—accounted as parts of, representatives of,
 Himself (ver. 40)—in this judgment they are not the judged (John v. 24: 1 Cor.

 xi. 31). But these who are the judged, know not that all their deeds of love have been done to and for Christ—they are overwhelmed with the sight of the grace which has been working in and for them, and the glory which is now their blessed portion. And notice, that it is not the works, as such, but the love which prompted them—that love which was their faith,—which felt its way, though in darkness, to Him who is Love,—which is commended. τῶν ἀδελφ.] Not necessarily the saints with Him in glory—though primarily those—but also any of the great family of man. Many of those here judged may never have had opportunity of doing these things to the saints of Christ properly so called. In this is fulfilled the covenant of God to Abraham, ἐνευλογηθῶσιν ἐν τῇ σπέρματι

'cursed of my Father,' because all man's salvation is of God—all his condemnation from himself. 'The Kingdom, prepared for you;' but 'the fire, which has been prepared for the devil and his angels' [notice τὸ πῦρ τὸ αἰών. τὸ ἥτοιμα. . . . greater definiteness could not be given: that particular fire, that eternal fire, created for a special purpose]—not, for you: because there is election to life—but there is no reprobation to death:—a book of Life—but no book of Death; no hell for man—because the blood of Jesus hath purchased life for all: but they who will serve the devil, must share with him in the end.

The repetition of all these particulars shews how exact even for every individual the judgment will be. Stier excellently remarks, that the curse shews the termination of the High Priesthood of Christ, in which office He only intercedes and blesses. Henceforth He is King and Lord—his enemies being now for ever put under his feet. ^{44, 45.} See note on ver. 37.

The sublimity of this description surpasses all imagination—Christ, as the Son of Man, the Shepherd, the King, the Judge—as the centre and end of all human love, bringing out and rewarding his latent grace in those who have lived in love—everlastingly punishing those who have quenched it in an unloving and selfish life—and in the accomplishment of his mediatorial office, causing, even from out of the iniquities of a rebellious world, his sovereign mercy to rejoice against judgment. ^{46.} See John v. 28, 29; and as taking up the prophetic history at this point, Rev. xxi. 1—8. Observe, the same epithet is used for κόλασις and ζῶή—which are here contraries—for the ζῶή here spoken of is not bare existence, which would have annihilation for its opposite; but blessedness and reward, to which punishment and misery are antagonist terms. [N.B. I think it proper to state in this 3rd edition, that having now entered on the deeper study of the prophetic portions of the N. T., I do not feel by any means that full confidence which I once did, in the exegesis, quoted prophetic interpretation, here given of the three portions of this chap. xxv. But I have no other system to substitute: and some of the points here dwelt on seem to me as weighty as ever. I very much question whether the thorough study of Scripture prophecy will not make me more and more distrustful of all human systematizing, and less willing to hazard strong assertion on any portion of the subject. July, 1865. Endorsed, Oct. 1858. At the same time, the coincidence of these portions with the process of the great last things in Rev. xx. and xxi. is never to be overlooked, and should be our guide to their explanation, however distrustful we may be of its certainty. Those who set this coincidence aside, and interpret each portion by itself, without connexion with the rest, are clearly wrong. 1861.]

office begins to be entered upon. He had not completed all his discourses, for He delivered, after this, those contained in John xiv.—xvii.—but not in public; only to the inner circle of his disciples. From this point commences THE NARRATIVE OF HIS PASSION. 2. μετὰ δύο ἡμ.] This gives no certainty as to the time when the words were said: we do not know whether the current day was included or otherwise. But thus much of importance we learn from them: that the delivery of our Lord to be crucified, and the taking place of the Passover, strictly coincided. The solemn mention of them in this connexion is equivalent to a declaration from Himself, if it were needed, of the identity, both of time and meaning, of the two sacrifices; and serves as the fixed point in the difficult chronological arrangement of the history of the Passion. The latter clause, καὶ ὁ υἱὸς κ.τ.λ. depends on οἴδατε as well as the former. Our Lord had doubtless before joined these two events together in his announcements to his disciples. To separate this clause from the former, 'and then' &c. seems to me to do violence to the construction. It would require καὶ τότε.

3—5.] CONSPIRACY OF THE JEWISH AUTHORITIES. (Mark xiv. 1. Luke xxii. 2.) This assembling has no connexion with what has just been related, but follows rather on the end of ch. xxiii. ὁ λεγόμενος K. is in Jos. Antt. xviii. 2. 2, Ἰωσηφός δ καὶ Καϊάφας. Valerius VOL. I.

Gratus, Procurator of Judaea, had appointed him instead of Simon ben Kamith. He continued through the procuratorship of Pontius Pilate, and was displaced by the proconsul Vitellius, A.D. 37. See note on Luke iii. 2, and chronological table in Prolegg. to Acts, Vol. II. τοῦ λεγ. does not mean 'surnamed,' but (see ver. 14) implies that some name is to follow, which is more than, or different from, the real one of the person. καὶ ἐν τ. ἡ.] This expression must be taken as meaning the whole period of the feast—the seven days. On the feast-day, i. e. the day on which the Passover was sacrificed (E. V.), they could not lay hold of and slay any one, as it was a day of sabbatical obligation (Exod. xii. 16). See note on ver. 17.

6—13.] THE ANOINTING AT BETHANY. (Mark xiv. 3—9. John xii. 1—8. On Luke vii. 36—50, see note there.) This history of the anointing of our Lord is here inserted out of its place. It occurred six days before the Passover, John xii. 1. It perhaps can hardly be said that in its position here, it accounts in any degree for the subsequent application of Judas to the Sanhedrim (vv. 14—16), since his name is not even mentioned in it: but I can hardly doubt that it originally was placed where it here stands by those who were aware of its connexion with that application. The paragraphs in the beginning of this chapter come in regular sequence, thus: Jesus announces his approaching Passion: the chief priests, &c. meet and plot His capture, but not during the feast:

but when Jesus was in Bethany, &c. occasion was given for an offer to be made to them, which led to its being effected, after all, during the feast. On the rebuke given to Judas at this time having led to his putting into effect his intention of betraying our Lord, see note on John xii. 2. The trace of what I believe to have been the original reason of the anointing being inserted in this place, is still further lost in Mark, who instead of τοῦ δὲ Ἰησοῦ γενομένου . . . has καὶ δυτος αὐτοῦ . . .
 just as if the narrative were continued, and at the end instead of our τότε πορευθεῖς
 . . . has καὶ ὁ Ἰουδας . . . as if there were no connexion between the two. It certainly cannot be said of St. Matthew (De Wette, Neander, Stier) that he relates the anointing as taking place two days before the Passover: of St. Mark it may be said.

It may be observed that St. Luke relates nothing of our Lord's visits to Bethany.

8. Σίμωνος τοῦ λ.] Not at this time a leper, or he could not be at his house receiving guests. It is at least possible, that he may have been healed by our Lord. Who he was, is wholly uncertain.
 From Martha serving (John xii. 2), it would appear as if she were at home in the house (Luke x. 38 sq.); and that Lazarus was one τῶν ἀνακειμένων need not necessarily imply that he was a guest properly so called. He had been probably (see John xii. 9) absent with Jesus at Ephraim, and on this account and naturally for other reasons would be an object of interest, and one of the ἀνακειμένοι.

8. οἱ μαθηταὶ] Judas alone is mentioned, John xii. 4. It may have been that some that John, from his peculiar position at the

 If so, the independent origin of the two ac-

12.] I can hardly think that our Lord would have said this, unless there had been in Mary's mind a distinct reference to His burial, in doing the act. All the company surely knew well that his death, and that by crucifixion, was near at hand : can we suppose one who so closely observed his words as Mary, not to have been possessed with the thought of that which was about to happen? The προίλαβεν μυσίας μου τὸ σῶμα of Mark (xiv. 8) and the ἴτα εἰς τὴν ἡμ. τοῦ ἔνταφ. μου ῥησῆσθαι αὐτὸ of John (xii. 7) point even more strongly to her intention.

13.] The only case in which our Lord has made such a promise. We cannot but be struck with the majesty of this prophetic announcement; introduced with the peculiar and weighty ἀμὴν λέγω ὑμῖν,—conveying, by implication, the whole mystery of the εὐαγγέλιον which should go forth from His Death as its source,—looking forward to the end of time, when it shall have been preached in the whole world,—and specifying the fact that this deed should be recorded wherever it is preached. We may notice (1) that this announcement is a distinct prophetic recognition by our Lord of the existence of written records, in which the deed should be related; for in no other conceivable way could the universalty of mention be brought about: (2) that we have here (if indeed we needed it) a convincing argument against that view of our three first Gospels which supposes them to have been compiled from an original document: for if there had been such a document, it must have contained this narrative, and no one using such a Gospel could have failed to insert this narrative, accompanied by such a promise, in his own work; which St. Luke has failed to do: (3) that the same consideration is equally decisive against Luke having used, or even seen, our present Gospels of Matthew and Mark. (See the English translation of Schleiermacher's Essay on Luke, p. 121.) (4) As regards the practical use of the announcement, we see that though the honourable mention of a noble deed is thereby recognized by our Lord as a legitimate source of joy to us, yet by the very nature of the case all regard to such mention as a motive is excluded. The motive was Love alone.

In all probability, immediately after the conclusion of our Lord's discourses, and therefore coincidently with the meeting of the Sanhedrim in ver. 3. As these verses bring before us the first overt act of Judas's treachery, I will give here what appears to me the true estimate of his character and motives. In the main, my view agrees with that given by Neander, in his Leben Jesu, p. 688. I believe that Judas at first became attached to our Lord with much the same view as the other Apostles. He appears to have been a man with a practical talent for this world's business, which gave occasion to his being appointed the Treasurer, or Bursar, of the company (John xii. 6; xiii. 29). But the self-seeking, sensuous element, which his character had in common with that of the other Apostles, was deeper rooted in him; and the spirit and love of Christ gained no such influence over him as over the others, who were more disposed to the reception of divine things. In proportion as he found our Lord's progress disappoint his greedy anticipations, did his attachment to Him give place to coldness and aversion. The exhibition of miracles alone could not keep him faithful, when once the deeper appreciation of the Lord's Divine Person failed. We find by implication a remarkable example of this in John vi. 60—66, 70, 71, where the denunciation of the one unfaithful among the twelve seems to point to the (then) state of his mind, as already beginning to be scandalized at Christ. Add to this, that latterly the increasing clearness of the Lord's announcements of his approaching passion and death, while they gradually opened the eyes of the other Apostles to some terrible event to come, without shaking their attachment to Him, was calculated to involve in more bitter disappointment and disgust one so disposed to Him as Judas was. The actually exciting causes of the deed of treachery at this particular time may have been many. The reproof administered at Bethany (on the Saturday evening probably), disappointment at seeing the triumphal entry followed not by the adhesion but by the more bitter enmity of the Jewish authorities,—the denunciations of our Lord in ch. xxii. xxiii. rendering the breach irreparable,—and perhaps his last announcement in ver. 2, making it certain that his death would soon take place, and sharpening the eagerness of the traitor to profit by it :—all these may have influenced him to apply to the chief priests as he did.

With regard to his motives in general, I cannot think that he had any design but that of sordid gain, to be achieved by the darkest treachery. See further on this the note on ch. xxvii. 3. ^{15.]} ἔστη-σαν may be either weighed out, or appointed. That the money was paid to Judas (ch. xxvii. 3) is no decisive argument for the former meaning; for it may have been paid on the delivery of Jesus to the Sanhedrim. The συνιέναι of Luke and ἐπηγγέλαντο of Mark would lead us to prefer the other. ^{τριάκοντα ἀργύρια.]} Thirty shekels, = the price of the life of a servant, Exod. xxi. 32. Between three and four pounds of our money. St. Matthew is the only Evangelist who mentions the sum. De Wette and others have supposed that the mention of thirty pieces of silver with the verb ἔστησαν, has arisen from the prophecy of Zechariah (xi. 12), which St. Matthew clearly has in view. The others have simply ἀργύριον. It is just possible that the thirty pieces may have been merely earnest-money: but a difficulty attends the supposition; if so, Judas would have been entitled to the whole on our Lord being delivered up to the Sanhedrim (for this was all he undertook to do); whereas we find (ch. xxvii. 3) that after our Lord's condemnation, Judas brought only the thirty pieces back, and nothing more. See note there.

17—19.] PREPARATION FOR CELEBRATING THE PASSOVER. Mark xiv. 12—16. Luke xxii. 7—13. The whole narrative which follows is extremely difficult to arrange and account for chronologically. Our Evangelist is the least circumstantial, and, as will I think appear, the least exact in detail of the three. St. Mark partially fills up the outline;—but the account of St. Luke is the most detailed, and I believe the most exact. It is to be noticed that the narrative which St. Paul gives, 1 Cor. xi. 23—25, of the institution of the Lord's Supper, and which he states he 'received from the Lord,' coincides almost verbatim with that given by Luke. But while we say this, it must not be forgotten that over all three narratives extends the great difficulty of explaining ὁ ἡμέρας τῶν ἁγίων (Matt., Mark), or ὁ ἡμέρας τ. ἁγίων (Luke), and of reconciling the impression undeniably conveyed by them, that the Lord and his disciples ate the usual Passover, with the narrative of St. John, which not only does not sanction, but I believe absolutely excludes such a supposition. I shall give in as short a compass as I can, the various solutions which have been attempted, and the objections to them; fairly confessing that none of them satisfy me, and that at present I have none of my own. I will (1) state the grounds of the difficulty itself. The day alluded to in all four histories as that of the supper, which is unquestionably one and identical, is Thursday, the 13th of Nisan. Now the day of the Passover being slain and eaten was the 14th of Nisan (Exod. xii. 6, 18: Lev. xxiii. 5: Numb. ix. 8; xxviii. 16: Ezek. xlv. 21), between the evenings (ὡσπριν), which was interpreted by the generality of the Jews to mean the interval between the first westering of the sun (3 p.m.) and its setting,—but by the Karaites and Samaritans that between sunset and darkness:—in either case, however, the day was the same. The feast of unleavened bread began at the very time of eating the Passover (Exod. xii. 18), so that the first day of the feast of unleavened bread was the 15th (Numb. xxviii. 17). All this agrees with the narrative of John, where (xiii. 1) the last supper takes place, πρὸ τῆς ἑσπ. τοῦ πάσχα—where the disciples think (ib. ver. 29) that Judas had been directed to buy the things ὧς χρειαζομένων εἰς τὴν ἑσπριν,—where the Jews (xviii. 28) would not enter into the prætorium, lest they should be defiled, ἀλλ' ἵνα φάγωσιν τὸ πάσχα (see note on John xviii. 28)—where at the exhibition of our Lord by Pilate (on the Friday at noon) it was (xix. 14) παρασκευὴ τοῦ πάσχα—and where it could be said (xix. 31) ἦν γὰρ μεγάλη ἡ ἡμέρα τῶν σαββάτων,—being as it was a double Sabbath,—the coincidence of the first day of unleavened bread, which was sabbatically hallowed (Exod. xii. 16), with an actual sabbath. But as plainly it does not agree with the view of the three other Evangelists, who not only relate the meal on the evening of the 13th of Nisan to have been a Passover, but manifestly regard it as the ordinary legal time of eating it. τῇ ἡμέρας τ. ἁγίων, ὅτε τὸ πάσχα ἔσθον (Mark xiv. 12) ὃ ἔσθον ὁμοῦ τὸ πάσχα (Luke xxii. 7), and in our Gospel by implication, in the use of τὸ πάσχα, &c., without any qualifying remark.

The solutions which have been proposed are the following: (1) that the Passover which our Lord and his disciples ate, was not the ordinary, but an anticipatory one, seeing that He himself was about to be sacrificed as the true Passover at the legal time. To this it may be objected that such an anticipation would have been wholly unprecedented and irregular, in a matter most strictly laid down by the law: and that in the three Gospels there is no allusion to it, but rather every thing (see above) to render it improbable. (2) That our Lord and his disciples ate the Passover, but at the time observed by a certain portion of the Jews, while He himself was sacrificed at the time generally observed. This solution is objectionable, as wanting any historical testimony whereon to ground it, being in fact a pure assumption. Besides, it is clearly inconsistent with Mark xiv. 12: Luke xxii. 7, cited above. A similar objection lies against (3) the notion that our Lord ate the Passover at the strictly legal, the Jews at an inaccurate and illegal time. (4) Our Lord ate only a πάσχα μνημονευτικόν, such as the Jews now celebrate, and not a πάσχα ἑσπρινόν (Grotius). But this is refuted by the absence of any mention of a π. μνημ. before the destruction of Jerusalem; besides its inconsistency with the above-cited passages. (5) Our Lord did not eat the Passover at all. But this is manifestly not a solution of the difficulty, but a setting aside of one of the differing accounts: for the three Gospels manifestly give the impression that He did eat it. (6) The solution offered by Chrys., on our ver. 58 (Hom. lxxxiv. p. 800), is at least ingenious. The Council, he says, did not eat their Passover at the proper time, but in ἑσπριν ἡμέρᾳ ἔφαγον, καὶ τὸν νόμον ἔδωκαν, διὰ τὴν ἐπιθυμίαν τὴν περὶ τὴν σφαγὴν ταύτην . . . ἔδωκαν καὶ τὸ πάσχα ἀδείναι, ὑπὲρ τοῦ τὴν φονεὴν αὐτῶν ἐκπλήσαι ἐπιθυμίαν. This had been suggested before in a scholium of Eusebius: see Wordsw.'s note on John xviii. 28, in which it is adopted. But St. John's habit of noticing and explaining all such exceptional circumstances, makes it very improbable. [I may state, as some solutions have been sent me by correspondents, that I have seen nothing besides the above, which justifies any extended notice. 1862.]

I will conclude this note by offering a few hints which, though not pointing to any particular solution, ought I think to enter into the consideration of the question. (a) That, on the evening of the 13th (i. e. the beginning of the 14th) of Nisan, the Lord ate a meal with his disciples, at which the announcement that one of them should betray Him was made: after which He went into the Garden of Gethsemane, and was betrayed (Matt., Mark, Luke, John):—(3) That, in some sense or other, this meal was regarded as the eating of the Passover (Matt., Mark, Luke). (The same may be inferred even from John; for some of the disciples must have gone into the praetorium, and have heard the conversation between our Lord and Pilate [John xviii. 33—38]; and as they were equally bound with the other Jews to eat the Passover, would equally with them have been incapacitated from so doing by having incurred defilement, had they not eaten theirs previously. It would appear too, from Joseph of Arimathea going to Pilate during the πασχευῇ [Mark xv. 42, 43], that he also had eaten his passover.) (γ) That it was not the ordinary passover of the Jews: for (Exod. xii. 22) when that was eaten, none might go out of the house until morning; whereas not only did Judas go out during the meal (John xiii. 29), but our Lord and the disciples went out when the meal was finished. Also when Judas went out, it was understood that he was gone to buy, which could not have been the case, had it been the night of eating the passover, which in all years was sabbatically hallowed. (δ) John, who omits all mention of the Paschal nature of this meal, also omits all mention of the distribution of the symbolic bread and wine.

The latter act was, strictly speaking, anticipatory: the Body was not yet broken, nor the Blood shed (but see note on ver. 28 ad fin.). Is it possible that the words in Luke xxii. 15, 16 may have been meant by our Lord as an express declaration of the anticipatory nature of that passover meal likewise? May they mean, 'I have been most anxious to eat this Paschal meal with you to-night (before I suffer), for I shall not eat it to-morrow,—I shall not eat of it any more with you?' May a hint to the same effect be intended in ὁ καρπὸς μου ἵγγύς ἐστιν (ver. 18), as accounting for the time of making ready—may the present tense ποιῶ itself have the same reference?

I may remark that the whole of the narrative of John, as compared with the others, satisfies me that he can never have seen their accounts. It is inconceivable, that one writing for the purpose avowed in John xi. 31, could have found the three accounts as we have them, and have made no more allusion to the discrepancy than the faint (and to all appearance undesignated) ones in ib. ch. xii. 1; xiii. 1, 29; xviii. 28.

17. τῇ ᾠρ. τ. εἰ.] If this night had been the ordinary time of sacrificing the Passover, the day preceding would not indeed have been strictly the first day of unleavened bread; but there is reason to suppose that it was accounted so. The putting away leaven from the houses was part of the work of the day, and the eating of the unleavened bread actually commenced in the evening. Thus Josephus, Antt. ii. 15. 1, ἐσπρὸν ἀγομὴν ἐφ' ἡμέρας ἑκάστη, τὴν τῶν ἀζύμων λεγομένην,—including this day in the feast.

τοῦ θύλας.] The 'making ready' would include the following particulars: the preparation of the guest-chamber itself (which however in this case was already done, see Mark xiv. 15 and note);—the lamb already kept up from the 10th (Exod. xii. 3) had to be slain in the fore court of the temple (2 Chron. xxxv. 5: see also Joseph. B. J. vi. 9. 3);—the unleavened bread, bitter herbs, &c., prepared;—and the room arranged. This report does not represent the whole that passed: it was the Lord who sent the two disciples; and in reply this enquiry was made (Luke).

18.] The person spoken of was unknown even by name, as appears from Mark and Luke, where he is to be found by the turning in of a man with a pitcher of water. The Lord spoke not from any previous arrangement, as some have thought, but in virtue of His knowledge, and command of circumstances. Compare the command ch. xxi. 2 sq., and that in ch. xvii. 27. In the words πρὸς τὸν δάνα here must be involved the additional circumstance mentioned by Mark and Luke, but perhaps unknown to our narrator: see note on Luke xxii. 10, where the fullest account is found.

The words ὁ δάνα, common to the three accounts, do not imply that the man was a disciple of our Lord. It was the common practice during the feast for persons to receive strangers into their houses gratuitously, for the purpose of eating the Passover: and in this description of Himself in addressing a stranger, our Lord has a deep meaning, as (perhaps, but see note) in ὁ κύριος ch. xxi. 3. 'Our Master and thine says.' It is His form of 'pressing' for the service of the King of this earth, the things that are therein.

ὁ καιρός μου is not 'the time of the feast,' but my time, i. e. for suffering: see John vii. 8 al. freq. There is no reason for supposing from this expression that ὁ δάνα was aware of its meaning. The bearers of the message were; and the words, to the receiver of it, bore with them a weighty subjective reason, which, with such a title as ὁ διδάσκαλος prefixed, he was bound to respect. For these words we are indebted to St. Matthew's narrative.

20—23.] JESUS, CELEBRATING THE PASSOVER, ANNOUNCES HIS BETRAYER.

second is shown by the fact, that what now took place was during the celebration of the Passover: that the same Paul states that Christ our Passover is sacrificed for us; thus identifying the body broken, and blood shed, of which the bread and wine here are symbolic, with the Paschal feast. (3) That the key to the right understanding of what took place must be found in our Lord's discourse after the feeding of the five thousand in John vi., since He there, and there only besides this place, speaks of His flesh and blood in the connexion found here. (4) It is impossible to assign to this event its precise place in the meal. St. Luke inserts it before the announcement of the treason of Judas: St. Matt. and St. Mark after it. It is doubtful whether the accounts found in the Talmud and elsewhere of the ceremonies in the Paschal feast (see Lightfoot ad loc., De Wette) are to be depended on:—they are exceedingly complicated. Thus much seems clear,—that our Lord blessed and passed round two cups, one before, the other after the supper,—and that He distributed the unleavened cake during the meal. More than this is conjecture. The dipping of the hand in the dish, and dipping and giving the sop, may also possibly correspond to parts of the Jewish ceremonial.

26.] While they were eating, during the meal,—as distinguished from the distribution of the cup, which was after it.

No especial stress must be laid on the article before ἄρτον; it would be the bread which lay before Him: see below. The bread would be unleavened, as the day was ἡ πρώτη τῶν ἀζύμων (see Exod. xii. 8).

εὐλογήσας and ευχαριστήσας amount to the same in practice. The looking up to heaven, and giving thanks was a virtual 'blessing' of the meal or the bread. εὐλογ. must be construed transitively (1 Cor. x. 16).

ἄρτον is governed by all four verbs, λαβῶν, εὐλογήσας, ἐκλασεν, ἰδίδου (see also Luke ix. 16, and the ref. to the text here). It was customary in the Paschal meal for the Master, in breaking the bread, to give thanks for the fruit of the earth. But our Lord did more than this: "Non pro veteri tantum creatione, sed et pro nova, cujus ergo in hunc orbem venerat, preces fudit, gratiasque Deo egit pro redemptione humani generis quasi jam perfecta." Grotius.

From this giving of thanks for and blessing the offering, the Holy Communion has been from the earliest times also called ευχαριστία, viz. by Justin Martyr, Cyril of Jerusalem, Origen, Clem. Alex., Chrysostom, &c. The passages may be seen in Suicer's Thesaurus, under the word. ἔκλασεν] It was a round cake of unleavened bread, which the Lord broke and divided: signifying thereby both the breaking of his body on the Cross, and the participation in the benefits of his death by all His. Hence the act of communion was known by the name ἡ κλάσις τοῦ ἄρτου, Acts ii. 42. See 1 Cor. x. 16, also Isa. lviii. 7: Lam. iv. 4. ἐσθω, imperf. He gave to each, distributed.

ῥάβετε φάγετε] Our Gospel alone has both words. φάγετε is spurious in Mark: both words, in 1 Cor. xi. 24. Here, they are undoubted: and seem to shew us (see note on Luke, ver. 17) that the Lord did not Himself partake of the bread or wine. It is thought by some however that He did: e. g. Chrysostom, Hom. lxxii. p. 783, τὸ λαοῦ αἷμα αὐτὸς ἔπινεν. But the analogy of the whole, as well as these words, and πίνει ἐξ αὐτοῦ πάντες below, lead us to a different conclusion. Our Lord's non-participation is however no rule for the administrator of the rite in after times. Although in one sense he represents Christ, blessing, breaking, and distributing; in another, he is one of the disciples, examining himself, confessing, partaking. Throughout all Church ministrations this double capacity must be borne in mind. Olshausen (ii. 449) maintains the opposite view, and holds that the ministrant cannot unite in himself the two characters. But setting the inner

τὸ αὐτό, this, which I now offer to you, this bread. The form of expression is important, not being οὗτος ὁ ἄρτος, or οὗτος ὁ οἶνος, but τοῦτο, in both cases, or τοῦτο τὸ ποτήριον, not the bread or wine itself, but the thing in each case;—precluding all idea of a substantial change. ἐστιν] On this much controverted word itself no stress is to be laid. In the original tongue in which our Lord spoke, it would not be expressed: and as it now stands, it is merely the logical copula between the subject, this, and the predicate, my Body. The connexion of these two will require deeper consideration. First we may observe, as above of the subject, so here of the predicate, that it is not ἡ σὰρξ μου (although that very expression is didactically used in its general sense in John vi. 51, as applying to the bread), but τὸ σῶμά μου. The body is made up of flesh and blood; and although analogically the bread may represent one and the wine the other, the assertion here is not to be analogically taken merely: τοῦτο, this which I give you, (is) τὸ σῶμά μου. Under this is the mystery of my Body: the assertion has a literal, and has also a spiritual or symbolic meaning. And it is the literal meaning which gives to the spiritual and symbolic meaning its fitness and fulness. In the literal meaning then, this (is) my Body, we have BREAD, 'the staff of life,' identified with THE BODY OF THE LORD: not that particular ἄρτος with that particular σὰρξ which at that moment constituted the Body before them, nor any particular ἄρτος with the present Body of the Lord in Heaven: but τοῦτο, the food of man, with τὸ σῶμά μου. This is strikingly set forth in John vi. 51, καὶ ὁ ἄρτος ὃς ἐν ἐγὼ δίδωμι ἡ σὰρξ μου τοῖς υἱοῖς τῆς τοῦ κόσμου ζωῆς. Now the mystery of the Lord's Body is, that is and by it is all created being upheld: τὰ πάντα ἐν αὐτῷ συνίστηεν, Col. i. 17; ἐν αὐτῷ ζωὴ ἦν, John i. 4. And thus generally, and in the widest sense, is the Body of the Lord the sustenance and upholding of all living. Our very bodies are dependent upon his, and unless by his Body standing pure and accepted before the Father, could not exist nor be nourished. So that to all living things, in this largest sense, τὸ ζῆν, χριστός.

And all our nourishment and means of upholding are Christ. In this sense his Body is the Life of the world. Thus the fitness of the symbol for the thing now to be signified is shewn, not merely by analogy, but by the deep verities of Redemption. And this general and lower sense, underlying, as it does, all the spiritual and higher senses in John vi., brings us to the symbolic meaning which the Lord now first and expressly attaches to this sacramental bread. Rising into the higher region of spiritual things,—is and by the same Body of the Lord, standing before the Father in accepted righteousness, is all spiritual being upheld, but by the inward and spiritual process of feeding upon Him by faith: of making that Body our own, causing it to pass into and nourish our souls, even as the substance of the bread passes into and nourishes our bodies. Of this feeding upon Christ in the spirit by faith, is the sacramental bread the symbol to us. When the faithful in the Lord's Supper press with their teeth that sustenance, which is, even to the animal life of their bodies, the Body of Christ, whereby alone all animated being is upheld,—they feed in their souls on that Body of righteousness and acceptance, by partaking of which alone the body and soul are nourished unto everlasting life. And as, in the more general and natural sense, all that nourishes the body is the Body of Christ given for all,—so to them, in the inner spiritual sense, is the sacramental bread symbolic of that Body given for them,—their standing in which, in the adoption of sons, is witnessed by the sending abroad of the Spirit in their hearts. This last leads us to the important addition in Luke and 1 Cor. (but omitted here and in Mark) τὸ ὑπὲρ ὅμων (διδόμενον, Luke,—omitted in 1 Cor.),—τοῦτο ποιῶντες ἵνα τὴν ἡμῶν ἀνάμνησιν. On these words we may remark (1) that the participle is present; and, rendered with reference to the time when it was spoken, would be which is being given. The Passion had already begun; in fact the whole life on earth was this giving and breaking, consummated by his death: (2) that the commemorative part of the rite here enjoined strictly depends upon the symbolic meaning, and that, for its fitness, upon the literal meaning. The commemoration is of Him, in so far as He has come down into Time, and enacted the great acts of Redemption on this our world,—and shewn himself to us as living and speaking Man, an object of our personal love and affectionate remembrance:—but the other and higher parts of the Sacrament have regard to the results of those same acts of Redemption, as they are eternized in the counsels of the Father,—as the Lamb is slain from the foundation of the world (Rev. xiii. 8).

27.] ἔδωκεν, sor. He gave, not to each, but once for all: in remarkable coincidence with Luke xxii. 17, λάβετε τοῦτο καὶ διαμερίσατε ἑαυτοῖς. This was after the meal was ended: ὡς αὐτὸς καὶ τὸ ποτήριον μὲν τὸ διπνήσαι. (Luke and 1 Cor.) As remarked above, it is quite uncertain whether our Lord followed minutely the Jewish practices, and we cannot therefore say whether the cup was one of wine and water mixed. It hardly follows from the expression of ver. 29, ἡ τούτου τοῦ γεν. τ. ἀμικ., that it was of unmixed wine. The word ἀμικτωρ (in Luke and 1 Cor.) contains our λαβὼν καὶ εὐχαρ. ἔδωκεν. πότε ἐξ αὐτοῦ πάντες]

Peculiar to Matthew, preserved however in substance by Mark's καὶ ἵπνον ἐξ αὐτοῦ πάντες. The πάντες is remarkable, especially with reference to the practice of the Church of Rome, which forbids the cup to the laity. Calvin remarks: "Cur de pane simpliciter dixit ut ederent; de calice, ut omnes biberent? Ac si Satanæ calliditati ex destinato occurrere voluisset." (Cited in Stier, vi. 115.) It is on all accounts probable, and this command confirms the probability, that Judas was present, and partook of both parts of this first communion. The expressions are such throughout as to lead us to suppose that the same persons, οἱ δώδεκα, were present. On the circumstance mentioned John xiii. 30, which has mainly contributed to the other opinion, see note there.

28. τοῦτο γάρ ἐστιν τὸ αἷμά μου τῆς [καρῆς] θεοῦ. So Mark also, omitting γαρ and καρῆς. In Luke and 1 Cor. there is an important verbal difference. τοῦτο τὸ ποτήριον ἡ καὶ ἡ διαθ. [ἐστὶν] ἡ τῇ ἡμῶν αἱματι. But if we consider the matter closely, the real difference is but trifling, if any. Let us recur to the paschal rite. The lamb (χριστὸς τὸ πάσχα ἡμῶν) being killed, the blood (τὸ αἷμα τῆς διαθήκης, Exod. xxiv. 8) is sprinkled on the doorposts, and is a sign to the destroying angel to spare the house. The blood of the covenant is the blood of the lamb. So also in the new covenant. The blood of the Lamb of God, slain for us, being not only, as in the former case, sprinkled on, but actually partaken spiritually and assimilated by, the faithful soul, is the blood of the new covenant; and the sacramental cup, is, signifies, sets forth (καταγγέλλει, 1 Cor. xi. 26), this covenant is His blood, i. e. consisting in a participation in His blood. With this explanation let us recur to the words in our text. First it will be observed that there is not here that absolute assertion which τοῦτο ἐστὶν τὸ αἷμά μου conveyed. It is not τοῦτο ἐστὶν τὸ αἷμά μου absolutely. Wine, in general, does not represent by itself the effects (on the creation) of the blood of Christ; it, like every other nourishment of the body, is nourishment to us by and in Him, inasmuch as in Him all things consist: but there is no peculiar propriety whereby it is to us his blood alone. But it is made so by a covenant office which it holds in his own declaration. Without shedding of blood was no remission of sins under the old covenant: and blood was, throughout, the covenant sign of forgiveness and acceptance. (See ref. Heb., where the Author, substituting τοῦτο for ἰδοὺ in the LXX of Exod. xxiv. 8, seems to be alluding to this very formula.) Now all this blood of sacrifice finds its true reality and fulfilment in the blood of Christ, shed for the remission of sins. This is the very promise of the new covenant, see Heb. viii. 8—13, as distinguished from the old: the ἀφαιρέσις ἁμαρτιῶν, once for all,—whereas the old had continual offerings, which could not do this, Heb. x. 3, 4. And of this ἀφαιρέσις, the result of the outpouring of the blood of Christ,—first and most generally in bringing all creation into reconciliation with the Father (see Col. i. 20),—secondly and individually, in the application by faith of that blood to the believing soul,—do the faithful in the Lord's Supper partake. τὸ περὶ πολλῶν (Luke, ὑμῶν) ἀρχ.

On the present participle, see above. The situation of the words in Luke is remarkable; for τὸ ποτήριον is the subject of the sentence, and ἡ κ. διαθήκη the predicate. See note there. πολλῶν] See note, ch. xx. 28.

Cf. also Heb. ix. 28. εἰς ἄφειον ἁμαρτιῶν] Peculiar to Matthew: see above. The connexion is not niere . . . εἰς ἄφειον ἁμ. In the Sacrament, not the forgiveness of sins itself, but the refreshing and confirming assurance of that state of forgiveness is conveyed. The disciples (with one exception) were clean before the institution: John xiii. 10, 11. St. Paul, in 1 Cor. xi. 25, repeats the τοῦτο ποιεῖτε ὡς αἰς ἃν πίνητε εἰς τὴν ἰμὴν ἀνάμνησιν. On the words ὡς αἰς ἃν πίνητε, see note there.

In concluding this note I will observe that it is not the office of a Commentator to enter the arena of controversy respecting transubstantiation, further than by his exegesis his opinions are made apparent. It will be seen how entirely opposed to such a dogma is the view above given of the Sacrament. Once introduce it, and it utterly destroys both the verity of Christ's Body, and the sacramental nature of the ordinance. That it has done so, is proved (if further need be) by the mutilation of the Sacrament, and disobedience to the divine command, in the Church of Rome. See further notices of this in notes on 1 Cor. x. 16, and on John vi.

29.] This declaration I believe to be distinct from that in Luke xxii. 18. That was spoken over the first cup—this over one of the following. In addition to what has been said on Luke, we may observe, (1) that our Lord still calls the sacramental cup τὸ γίν. τῆς ἁμ., although by Himself pronounced to be his blood: (2) that these words carry on the meaning and continuance of this eucharistic ordinance, even into the new heavens and new earth. As Thiersch excellently says, in his Lectures on Catholicism and Protestantism, ii. 276 (cited by Stier, vi. 160), "The Lord's Supper points not only to the past, but to the future also. It has not only a commemorative, but also a prophetic meaning. In it we have not only to shew forth the Lord's death, until He come, but we have also to think of the time when He shall come to celebrate his holy Supper with his own, new, in his Kingdom of Glory. Every celebration of the Lord's Supper is a foretaste and prophetic anticipation of the great Marriage Supper which is prepared for the Church at the second appearing of Christ. This import of the Sacrament is declared in the words of the Lord, ὅτι μὴ πῶς ἀρ' ἄρτι κ.τ.λ. These words ought never to be omitted in any liturgical form of administering the Communion."

30—35.] DECLARATION THAT ALL SHOULD FORSAKE HIM. CONFIDENCE OF PETER. Mark xiv. 28—31. See Luke xii. 31—38: John xiii. 36—38. Here, accurately speaking perhaps between ἐμνήσαντες and ἐξῆλθεν, come in the discourses and prayer of our Lord in John xiv., xv., xvi., xvii., spoken (see note on John xiv. 31) without change of place, in the supper-chamber.

The ὕμνος was in all probability the last part of the Hallel, or great Hallel, which consisted of Psalms cxv.—cxviii.; the former part (Pa. cxiii. cxiv.)

πρὶν ἢ δις ἀλέκτορα φωνῆσαι τ. με ἀπ.
 The contrast to Peter's boast, and the climax, is in these words the strongest; and the inference also comes out most clearly, that they likewise were not now said for the first time. The first cock-crowing is at midnight; but inasmuch as few hear it,—when the word is used generally, we mean the second crowing, early in the morning, before dawn. If this view be taken, the ἀλέκτ. φων. and δις δλ. φ. amount to the same—only the latter is the more precise expression. It is most likely that Peter understood this expression as only a mark of time, and therefore received it, as when it was spoken before, as merely an expression of distrust on the Lord's part; it was this solemn and circumstantial repetition of it which afterwards struck upon his mind when the sign itself was literally fulfilled. A question has been raised whether cocks were usually kept or even allowed in Jerusalem. No such bird is mentioned in the O. T., and the Mishna states that the inhabitants of Jerusalem, and the priests every where, kept no fowls, because they scratched up unclean worms. But the Talmud is here not consistent with itself: and Lightfoot brings forward a story which proves it. And there might be many kept by the resident Romans, over whom the Jews had no power. We must not overlook the spiritual parabolic import of this warning. Peter stands here as a representative of all disciples who deny or forget Christ—and the watchful bird that cries in the night is that warning voice which 'speaketh once, yea twice,' to call them to repentance: see Rom. xiii. 11, 12.

35.] This ἂν δέη again appears to have the precision of a repeated asseveration. Mark has the stronger expression τε περισσὸν ἵλεγειν, which even more clearly indicates that the συναποθανεῖν was not now first said. The rest said it, but not so earnestly perhaps;—at all events, Peter's confidence cast theirs into the shade.

36—46.] OUR LORD'S AGONY AT GETHSEMANE. Mark xiv. 32—42. Luke xxii. 39—46. John xviii. 1. The account of the temptation, and of the agony in Gethsemane is peculiar to the three first Evangelists. But it does not therefore follow that there is, in their narratives, any inconsistency with St. John's setting forth of the Person of Christ. For it must be remembered, that, as we find in their accounts frequent manifestations of the divine nature, and indications of future glory, about, and during this conflict,—so in St. John's account, which brings out more the divine side of our Lord's working and speaking, we find frequent allusions to his human weakness and distress of spirit. For examples of the first, see vv. 13, 24, 29, 32, 53, and || in Mark and Luke; and Luke xxii. 30, 32, 37, 43; of the latter, John xii. 27; xiii. 21; xiv. 30; xvi. 32. The right understanding of the whole important narration must be acquired by bearing in mind the reality of the manhood of our Lord, in all its abasement and weakness:

—by following out in Him the analogy which pervades the characteristics of human suffering—the strength of the resolved spirit, and calm of the resigned will, continually broken in upon by the inward giving way of human feebleness, and limited power of endurance. But as in us, so in the Lord, these seasons of dread and conflict stir not the ruling will, alter not the firm resolve. This is most manifest in His first prayer—εἰ δυνατόν ἴσθιν—'if consistent with that work which I have covenanted to do.' Here is the reserve of the will to suffer—it is never stirred (see below). The conflict however of the Lord differs from ours in this,—that in us, the ruling will itself is but a phase of our human will, and may be and is often carried away by the excess of depression and suffering; whereas in Him it was the divine Personality in

The expression is said to be proverbial (see ref. Jonah): but we must remember that though with us men, who see from below, proverbs are merely bold guesses at truth,—with Him, who sees from above, they are the truth itself, in its very purest form. So that although when used by a man, a proverbial expression is not to be pressed to literal exactitude,—when used by our Lord, it is, just because it is a proverb, to be searched into and dwelt on all the more. The expression ἡ ψυχὴ μου, in this sense, spoken by our Lord, is only found besides in John xii. 27. It is the human soul, the seat of the affections and passions, which is troubled with the anguish of the body; and it is distinguished from the πνεῦμα, the higher spiritual being. Our Lord's soul was crushed down even to death by the weight of that anguish which lay upon Him—and that literally—so that He (as regards his humanity) would have died, had not strength (bodily strength, upholding his human frame) been ministered from on high by an angel (see note on Luke xxii. 43).

39.] προελθὼν μικρὸν (Matt., Mark) = ἀπεσπάσθη ἀπ' αὐτῶν ὥς ἐκ λίθου βολῆν Luke, who in this description is the more precise. ἀπειπ. I cannot help thinking, implies something more than mere removal from them—something of the reluctances of parting.

The distance would be very small, not above forty or fifty yards. Hence the disciples might well catch the leading words of our Lord's prayers, before drowsiness overpowered them. Luke has however only θεῖς τὰ γόνατα, which is not so full as our account. προσευχ.

Stier finely remarks: 'This was in truth a different prayer from that which went before, which John has recorded.' But still in the same spirit, uttered by the same Son of God and Redeemer of men. The glorifying (John xvii. 1) begins with suffering, as the previous words, ἐκφλυθὲν ἡ ὥρα, might lead us to expect. The 'power over all flesh' shews itself first as power of the conflicting and victorious spirit over his own flesh, by virtue of which He is 'one of us.' Mark expresses the substance of the prayer, and interprets περιήριον by ῥῶα. Luke's report differs only in verbal expression from Matthew's. In the address, we have here and in Luke Πάτερ—in Mark ἀβὲρ ὁ πατήρ. In all, and in the prayer itself, there is the deepest feeling and apprehension in the Redeemer's soul of his Sonship and the unity of the Father—the most entire and holy submission to His Will. We must not for a moment think of the Father's wrath abiding on Him as the cause of his suffering. Here is no fear of wrath,—but, in the depth of his human anguish, the very tenderness of filial love.

The variation in Mark and Luke in the substance of the prayer, though slight, is worthy of remark. εἰ δυνατόν ἐστιν = πάντα δύναμις σοι, = εἰ βούλει. All these three find their union in one and the same inward feeling. That in the text expresses, 'If, within the limits of thy holy will, this may be;—that in Mark, 'All things are (absolutely) possible to Thee—Thou canest therefore—but not what I will, but what thou wilt:'—that in Luke, 'If it be thy Will to remove, &c. (Thou canest): but not my will, but thine be done.' The very words used by our Lord, the Holy Spirit has not seen fit to give us—shewing us, even in this solemn instance, the comparative indifference of the letter, when we have the inner spirit. That our Lord should have uttered all three forms of the prayer, is not for a moment to be thought of; and such a view could only spring out of the most petty and unworthy appreciation of the purpose of Scripture narrative.

παρελθέτω] as we should say of a threatening cloud, 'It has gone over.' But what is the ποτήριον or ὥρα, of which our Lord here prays that it may pass by? Certainly, not the mere present feebleness and prostration of the bodily frame: not any mere section of his sufferings—but the whole—the betrayal, the trial, the mocking, the scourging, the cross, the grave, and all besides which our thoughts cannot reach. Of this all, his soul, in humble subjection to the higher Will, which was absolutely united and harmonious with the Will of the Father, prays that if possible it may pass over. And this prayer was heard—see Heb. v. 7—ἀπὸ τῆς ἐκκλησίας—on account of His pious resignation to the Father's will, or on the ground of it, so that it prevailed—

VOL. I.

He was strengthened from Heaven. He did indeed drink the cup to the dregs—but He was enabled to do it, and this ἐνίσχυσις was the answer to his prayer.

ἄλλην σὺν . . .] The Monothelite heresy, which held but one will in the Lord Jesus, is here plainly convicted of error. The distinction is clear, and marked by our Lord Himself. In His human soul, He willed to be freed from the dreadful things before Him—but this human will was overruled by the inner and divine purpose—the Will at unity with the Father's will.

40.] Mark agrees, except in relating the beginning of the address in the singular—no doubt accurately—for it was Peter (Simon, der hier kein Petrus war. Stier), who had pledged himself to go with Him to prison and death.

οὐκ ἴσχυω] see ref., 'adeo'—it implies their utter inability, as shewn by their present state of slumber. Are ye so entirely unable, &c.

πᾶν ὥρα need not imply that our Lord had been absent a whole hour:—if it is to be taken in any close meaning, it would be that the whole trial would last about that time. But most likely it is in allusion to the time of our Lord's trial, so often called by that name.

41.] Luke gives this command at the beginning and end of the whole; but his account is manifestly only a compendium, and not to be pressed chronologically. The command has respect to the immediate trial which was about to try them, and (for γρηγορῆσαι is a word of habit, not merely, as ἰσχύω Eph. v. 15, or ἰκνήσω 1 Cor. xv. 34, one of immediate import) also to the general duty of all disciples in all time.

εἰσελθεῖν εἰς π. is not to come into temptation merely, to be tempted: this lies not in our own power to avoid, and its happening is rather joy than sorrow to us—see James i. 2, where the word is περιερίσσει—but it implies an entering into temptation with the will, and entertaining of the temptation. Grotius compares ἐμψυρεν εἰς πειρασμόν 1 Tim. vi. 9. 'Plenius Hebraei dicunt, intrare in manum temptationis, hoc est, in ejus potestatem atque dominium, ita ut ab ea subjungemur atque absorbeamur' (Witaius, Exere. in Orat. Dom. p. 196, cited by Stier, vi. 237). ὅ μὲν εν.] I cannot doubt that this is said by our Lord in its most general meaning, and that He himself is included in it. At that moment He was giving as high and pre-eminent an example of its truth, as the disciples were affording a low and ignoble one. He, in the willingness of the spirit—yielding Himself to the Father's will to suffer and die, but weighed down by the weakness of the flesh: they, having professed, and really having, a willing spirit to suffer with Him, but, even in the one hour's watching, overcome by the burden of drowsiness. Observe it is here ἐνέμα, not ψυχῇ; and compare ver. 38 and note. To enter further into the depths of this assertion of our Lord would carry us beyond the limits of annotation: but see Stier's remarks, vi. 237—242. 43.] Mark merely says of this second prayer, τὸν αὐτὸν λόγον εἰπὼν. Luke gives it as ἑταρὶς προσηύχετο—and relates in addition, that His sweat was like the fall of drops of blood on the ground: see notes on Luke xxii. 44. [At what precise time the angel appeared to Him is uncertain: I should be inclined to think, after the first prayer, before He came to his disciples.] The words are not exactly the same: "the Lord knew that the Father always heard Him (John xi. 42); and therefore He understands the continuance of His trial as the answer to His last words, as Thou wilt." Stier. Here therefore the prayer is, If it be not possible . . . thy will be done. It is spoken in the fulness of self-resignation. 'Jam addita didendi mentione, propius ad bibendum se confert.' Bengel. 43.] Mark adds, and it is a note of accuracy, καὶ οὐκ ᾔδουσιν αὐτῷ. 44.] τὸν αὐτόν, viz. as the last. This third prayer is merely indicated in Mark, by ἔρχεται τὸ εἶπεν, on our Lord's return. 45, 46.] The clause καθεύδοντες λ. κ. ἀνὰ. has been variously understood. To take it interrogatively, does not improve the sense, and makes an unnatural break in the sentence, which proceeds indicatively afterwards. It seems to me that there can be but two ways of interpreting it—and both with an imperative construction. (1) Either it was said bona fide,— 'Since ye are not able to watch with Me, now ye may sleep on—for my hour is come, and I am about to be taken from you—which sense however is precluded by the ἰγείρεσθε ἄγωμεν below: or (2) it was said with an understanding of 'y' you can' as Bengel; 'si me excitantem non auditis, brevi aderunt alii qui vos excitent. Interea dormite, si vacat.' [Only let us beware of the so-called "deeper sense," suggested by Wordsw. here, "Now you may hope for sleep and rest (? cf. Mark xiii. 37: 1 Thess. v. 6, 7), for I am about to die."]

ἰδὼς ἔγγ. = εἰς ἔγγ. ἦλθεν Mark. The εἰς implies, 'It is enough'—enough of reproof to them for drowsiness—enough of exhortations to watch and pray—that was now coming which would cut all this short. This first ἰδὼς is hardly to be taken literally of the appearance of Judas and his band; it merely announces the approach of the hour, of which the Lord had so often spoken: but at the utterance of the second, it seems that they were in sight, and that may be taken literally.

This expression, παρὰ εἰς χεῖρας ἀμαρτωλῶν, should be noticed, as an echo of the Redeemer's anguish—it was the contact with sins,—and death, the wages of sins,—which all through His trial pressed heavily on His soul.

47—58.] BETRAYAL AND APPREHENSION OF JESUS. Mark xiv. 43—52. Luke xiii. 47—53. John xviii. 2—11. Mark's account has evidently been derived from the same source originally as Matthew's, but both had gained some important additions before they were finally committed to writing. Luke's is, as before, an abridged narrative, but abounding with new circumstances not related by the others. John's account is at first sight very dissimilar from either; see text above cited, and notes there. It may suffice now to say, that all which John, vv. 4—9, relates, must have happened on the first approach of the band—and is connected with our ἰγείρεσθε ἄγωμεν. Some particulars also must have happened, which are omitted by all: viz. the rejoining of the eight apostles (not alluded to in Luke ver. 48, as Greenwell supposes), and the preparing them for what was about to take place. On the other hand, John gives a hint that something had been passing in the garden, by his word ἐξῆλθεν, ver. 4. The two first Evangelists were evidently unaware of any such matter as that related by John, for they (Matt. ver. 49: Mark ver. 45) introduce the Kiss by an εἰσέλευσεν. 47.] Judas is specified as εἰς τῶν δώδεκα, probably because the appellation, as connected with this part of his history, had become the usual one—thus we have in Luke ὁ λεγόμενος Ἰούδ. εἰς τῶν δώδεκα—fuller still. To the reader, this specification is not without meaning, though that meaning may not have been intended. ὄχλος

There is nothing improbable in this (as Meyer, Schleiermacher, &c. maintain), seeing that we have these persons mixing among the multitude and stirring them up to demand the crucifixion of Jesus afterwards.

 common rendering of ἔδωκεν as a plusq.

 the aorist is simply historical,—gave above on ver. 47. The purpose of the John vv. 4—8, (and it is surely out of the question to suppose it to have taken place before, contrary to the plain meaning of John ver. 4,) has been doubted. Yet I think on a review of what had happened, it is very intelligible—not perhaps as some have supposed, to shew that Jesus could be approached with safety—but at all events as the sign agreed on with the Roman soldiers, who probably did not personally know Him, and who besides would have had their orders from the city, to take Him whom Judas should kiss. Thus the kiss would be necessary in the course of their military duty, as their authorization, —notwithstanding the previous declaration by Jesus of Himself. κατεφ. is hardly as in my former editions, another word for ἐφίλ. It may well have its common and proper meaning, 'Kissed him eagerly,' with ostentation, as a studied and pre-arranged sign. See Ellicott, Lectures on the life of our Lord, p. 381 note: and comp. Xenophon, Mem. ii. 6. 33, cited by Meyer, ὡς τοὺς καλοὺς φιλήσαντός μου,

 50.] In Luke we have Ἰουδα, φιλήματι τὸν υἱὸν τ. ἀνθ. παραδίδως,—which sense is involved in the text also: that variation shewing perhaps that one of the accounts is not from an eye-witness.

 can hardly be a question. No such use of the simple relative ὅς has ever been adduced: "pronomen ὅς pro interrogativo rīs usurpari, falsa est Hoogveeni opinio, ad Viger. v. 14, alienissimo Demosthenis loco (p. 779) abutentis." Lobeck on Phryn. p. 57 note. It therefore must be either an exclamation, as Fritzache, "ad qualem rem perpetrandam ades!" which would be equally alien from the usage of ὅς, exclamations of this sort in Greek being expressed in an interrogative form:—or an aposiopesis, as Euthym., δι' ὃ παραγγένας, ἤγουν τὸ κατὰ σκοπὸν πράττει, τοῦ προσχηματος ἀφίμνω. And to this I should incline. "Friend, there needs not this shew of attachment: I know thine errand,—hoc age." But the command itself is suppressed. See Meyer's note, who also takes this view. On any understanding of the words, it is an appeal to the conscience and heart of Judas, in which sense (see above) it agrees with the words spoken in Luke:—see note there. The fact that at this period our Lord was laid hold of and secured (by hand—not yet bound) by the hand, is important, as interpreting Luke's account further on. 51.] The εἰς idle to enquire: one supposition only must be avoided—that there is any purpose in the omission. It is absurd to suppose that the mention of his name in a book

current only among Christians, many years after the fact, could lead to his apprehension, which did not take place at the time, although he was recognized as the striker in the palace of the High-priest, John ver. 26. The real reason of the non-apprehension was, that the servant was healed by the Lord. This is the first opposition to 'Thy will be done.' Luke expresses it, that they saw what would happen—and asked, 'Lord, shall we smite with the sword?' Then, while the other (for there were but two swords in the company) was waiting for the reply, the rash Peter, in the very spirit of ch. xvi. 22, smote with the sword—the weapon of the flesh:—an outbreak of the natural man no less noticeable than that more-noticed one which followed before morning. All four evangelists agree in this account. Luke and John are most exact—the latter giving the name of the slave,—Malchus. The aim was a deadly one, and Peter narrowly escaped being one ὅστις ἐν τῇ ἐπάσει φόνον πεποιήκει. From Luke, ver. 51, we learn that our Lord said ἰδὲς ἡς τοῦτον (on the meaning of which see note there), touched the ear and healed it. ὁρίεν] "plerique corporis partibus vulgaris dialectus formam diminutivam tribuit, rd μνία, Aristot. Our Lord does not say 'Cast away thy sword;' only in His willing self-sacrifice, and in that kingdom which is to be evolved from his work of redemption, is the sword altogether out of place.

πάντες γὰρ κ.τ.λ.] Peculiar to Matthew. There is no allusion, as Grotius and some of the ancients thought, to the Jews perishing by the Roman sword ('crudeles istos et sanguinarios, etiam te quiescente, gravissimas Deo daturus penas suo sanguine,' Grot. Euthym.): for the very persons who were now taking Him were Romans. The saying is general—and the stress is on λαβόντες—it was this that Peter was doing—'taking up the sword'—of his own will; taking that vengeance which belongs to God, into his own hand. ἐν μαχαίρῃ ἐπὶ αὐτοῦ is a command; not merely a future, but an imperative future; a repetition by the Lord in this solemn moment of Gen. ix. 6. weapons? 55.] Mark begins this with an ἀποκριθεῖς—it was an answer to their actions, not to their words. Luke,

here minutely accurate, informs us that it was to the chief priests and scribes

τοῦ ἱεροῦ and elders, that our Lord said this. It is strange that the exact agreement of this classification with μεθ' ὑμῶν ἐν τῇ ἱερῷ did not prevent Schleiermacher from casting a doubt on the truth of the circumstance (English Translation, p. 302).

In his submission to be reckoned among the transgressors, our Lord yet protests against any suspicion that He could act as such. καθ' ἡμέραν—

during the week past, and perhaps at other similar times. ἐκαθεζόμεν

(Matt. only) to indicate complete quiet and freedom from attack. ἐκαθεζόμεν δεδάσκειν is the greatest possible contrast to ληστής. 56.] It is doubted whether these words are a continuation of our Lord's speech, or a remark inserted by

Matthew. The use of τοῦτο δὲ ἔλεον γίγεναι in this Gospel would lead us to the latter conclusion: but when we reflect that thus our Lord's speech would lose all its completeness, and that Mark gives in different words the speech going on to this same purport, we must I think decide for the other view. Besides, if the remark were Matthew's, we should expect

some particular citation, as is elsewhere

his practice: see ch. i. 22; xxi. 4. Mark gives it elliptically, ἀλλ' ἵνα πληρωθῶσιν αἱ γραφαί. The Passion and Death of Christ were especially ὅ τῶν γραφῶν πλήρωσις. In this they all found their central point. Compare his dying words on the Cross,—τετέλεσται,—with this assertion. On the addition in Luke, see note there. There is an admirable sermon of Schleiermacher (vol. ii. of the Berlin ed. of 1843, p. 104) on vv. 55, 56.

not flee far. Peter and John went after Him to the palace of the High-priest; John, ver. 15. On the additional circumstance in Mark, ver. 51, see note there. Chrys.'s remark is worth noting: ὅτι μὲν γὰρ κατισχύθη, ἔμενον δὲ δι' ἐπιθίξαι τοῦτα πρὸς τοὺς δούλους, ἰφυγον ἰδόν γὰρ λαίπρον, δὲ οὐκ ἐτι διαφυγεῖν ἐν, ἐκόντος ἑαυτὸν παραδόντος αὐτοῖς καὶ λίγοντος κατὰ τὰς γραφὰς τοῦτο γινέσθαι.

57—68.] HEARING BEFORE CAIAPHAS. Mark xiv. 53—65. [Luke xxii. 54, 63—65.] John xviii. 24. Previous to this took place a hearing before Annas, the real High-priest (see note on Luke iii. 2), to whom the Jews took Jesus first;—who enquired of Him about his disciples and his teaching (John, vv. 19—23), and then (ver. 24) sent Him bound to Caiaphas. Only John, who followed, relates this first hearing. See notes on John, vv. 12—24, where this view is maintained. It may be sufficient here just to indicate the essential differences between this hearing and this. On that occasion no witnesses were required, for it was merely a private unofficial audience. Then the High-priest questioned and our Lord replied: whereas now, under false witness and reproach, He (as before Herod) is silent.

57. Καϊάφαν τὸν ἀρχ.] He was ἀρχιερεὺς τοῦ ἱναυροῦ ἐκείνου, Annas having been deposed, and since then the High-priests having been frequently changed by the Roman governors. ἔσω cf γρ.]

Probably they had assembled by a preconcerted design, expecting their prisoner. This was a meeting of the Sanhedrim, but not the regular assembly, which condemned him and handed Him over to Pilate. That took place in the morning, Luke xxii. 68—71 (where see note).

58.] “ἀπὸ μακρόθεν is a well-known pleonasm. μακρόθεν itself is a late Greek word. See Lob. on Phryn. p. 93.” Meyer.

We have not here the more complete detail of John xviii. 15—19. The αὐλή is one and the same great building, in which both Annas and Caiaphas lived. This is evident from a comparison of the narratives of Peter's denial: see below. The circumstance of a fire being lighted and the servants sitting round it, mentioned by the other three Evangelists, is here omitted.

59.] ψευδομαρτυρίαν, εὐθυμ. But is this quite implied? Is it not the intention of the Evangelist to represent that they sought false witness, not that they would not take true if they could get it, but that they knew it was not to be had?

This hearing is altogether omitted in Luke, and only the indignities following related, vv. 63—65.

60.] οὐχ εὑρον, i. e. sufficient for the purpose, or perhaps, consistent with itself. See note on ισαι, Mark ver. 56. 61.] See ch. xxvii. 40: the false witness consisted in giving that sense to His words, which it appears by ch. xxvii. 63 they know they did not bear. There is perhaps a trace, in the different reports of Matt. and Mark, of the discrepancy between the witnesses. There is considerable difference between τον ναον του θ. . . οικοδομησαι, and τον ν. τουτον τον χειροποιητον . . . ελλον χειροποιητον. The instance likewise of his zeal for the honour of the temple which had so lately occurred, might tend to perplex the evidence produced to the contrary. 62.] Dost thou not answer what it is which these testify against Thee? i. e. wilt Thou give no explanation of the words alleged to have been used by Thee? Our Lord was silent; for in answering He must have opened to them the meaning of these his words, which was not the work of this

His hour, nor fitting for that audience.

It is not easy to say whether this sentence ought to be taken as one question or two. Meyer, in his former editions, maintained the latter, on the ground that ἀποκρινυ would require προς after it. But he has now discovered in his fourth edition that ἀποκρίνισθαι may be constructed with an accusative simply, and that τι may be equivalent to στι. So that there is no serious objection remaining to the usual way of construction. 63.] See Levit. v. 1. ἐξορκίζω σε, 'I put thee under an oath,' the form of which follows. The junction of ὁ υἱὸς τ. θ. with χριστός must not be pressed beyond the meaning which Caiaphas probably assigned to it—viz. the title given to the Messiah from the purport of the prophecies respecting Him. It is however a very different thing when our Lord by his answer affirms this, and invests the words with their fullest meaning and dignity. 64.] By εὐ εἶπας, more may perhaps be implied than by Mark's ἔγω εἶμι: that is a simple assertion: this may refer to the convictions and admissions of Caiaphas (see John xi. 49). But this is somewhat doubtful. The expression is only used here and in ver. 25: and there does not appear to be any reference in it as said to Judas, to any previous admission of his. ἡλθον—but—i. e. 'there shall be a sign of the truth of what I say, over and above this confession of Mine.' ἀν' ἑστί—the glorification of Christ is by Himself said to begin with his betrayal, see John xiii. 31: from this time—from the accomplishment of this trial now proceeding. In what follows, the whole process of the triumph of the Lord Jesus even till its end is contained. The ἐκ δεξέων is to the council, the representatives of the chosen people, so soon to be judged by Him to whom all judgment is committed—the τῆς δυνάμεως in contrast to his present weakness—καθήμενον—even as they now sat to judge Him; and the ἐπὶ τ. ν. τ. οὐρ. (see Dan. vii. 37) looks onward to the awful time of the end, when every eye shall see Him. 65.] In Levit. xxi. 10 (see also Levit. x. 6) the High-priest is ordered not to rend his clothes; but that appears to apply only to mourning for the dead. In 1 Macc. xi. 71, and in Josephus, B. J. ii. 15. 4, we have instances of High-priests rending their clothes. On rending the clothes at hearing blasphemy, see 2 Kings xviii. 37. 66.] This was not a formal condemnation, but only a previous vote or expression of opinion. That took place in the morning, see ch. xvii. 1, and especially Luke xxii. 68—71. 67.] Luke gives these indignities, and in the same place as here, adding, what indeed might have been suspected, that it was not the members of the Sanhedrim, but the men who held Jesus in custody, who inflicted them on Him. καταφύξαι is to strike with the fist. παύλας, generally, to strike a flat blow with the back of the hand—but also, and probably here, since another set of persons are described as doing it, to strike with a staff.

69—75.] OUR LORD IS THrice DENIED BY PETER. Mark xiv. 66—72. Luke xxii. 56—62. John xviii. 17, 18, 25—27. This narrative furnishes one of the clearest instances of the entire independency of the four Gospels of one another. In it, they all differ, and, sup-sentences from Peter's mouth, each expressing a denial, and no more. On three occasions during the night he was recognized,—on three occasions he was a denier of his Lord: such a statement may well embrace reiterated expressions of recognition, and reiterated and importunate denials, on each occasion. And these remarks being taken into account, I premise that all difficulty is removed from the synopsis above given: the only resulting inferences being, (a) that the narratives are genuine truthful accounts of facts underlying them all: and (b) that they are, and must be, absolutely and entirely independent of one another.

For (1) the four accounts of the FIRST denial are remarkably coincident. In all four, Peter was in the outer hall, where the fire was made (see on ver. 69): a maid servant (Mt. Mk. L.),—the maid servant who kept the door (John) taxed him (in differing words in each, the comparison of which is very instructive) with being a disciple of Jesus: in all four he denies, again in differing words. I should be disposed to think this first recognition to have been but one, and the variations to be owing to the independence of the reports. (2) In the narratives of the SECOND denial, our first preliminary remark is well exemplified. The same maid (Mk. possibly: but not necessarily—perhaps, only the παιδίσκη in the προαίλιον)—another maid (Mt.), another (male) servant (Luke), the standers-by generally (John), charged him: again, in differing words. It seems he had retreated from the fire as if going to depart altogether (see note, ver. 69), and so attracted the attention both of the group at the fire and of the porters. It would appear to me that for some reason, John was not so accurately informed of the details of this as of the other denials. The “going out” (Mt. Mk.) is a super-added detail, of which the “standing and warming himself” (John) does not seem to be possessed. (3) On the THIRD occasion, the standers-by recognize him as a Galilean (simply, Mk. [ext.] Luke: by his dialect, Mt., an interesting additional particular),—and a kinsman of Malchus crowns the charge by identifying him in a way which might have proved most perilous, had not Peter immediately withdrawn. This third time again, his denials are differently reported:—but here, which is most interesting, we have in Mt. and Mk.'s “he began to curse and to swear” a very plain intimation, that he spoke not one sentence only, but a succession of vehement denials.

It will be seen, that the main fallacy which pervaded the note in my first edition, was that of requiring the recognitions, and the recognisers, in each case, to have been identical in the four. Had they been thus identical, in a case of this kind, the four accounts must have sprung from a common source, or have been corrected to one another: whereas their present varieties and coincidences are most valuable as indications of truthful independence. What I wish to impress on the minds of my readers is, that in narratives which have sprung from such truthful independent accounts, they must be prepared sometimes (as e. g. in the details of the day of the Resurrection) for discrepancies which, at our distance, we cannot satisfactorily arrange: now and then we may, as in this instance, be able to do so with something like verisimilitude:—in some cases, not at all. But whether we can thus arrange them or not, being thoroughly persuaded of the holy truthfulness of the Evangelists, and of the divine guidance under which they wrote, our faith is in no way shaken by such discrepancies. We value them rather, as testimonies to independence: and are sure, that if for one moment we could be put in complete possession of all the details as they happened, each account would find its justification, and the reasons of all the variations would appear. And this I firmly believe will one day be the case. (See the narrative of Peter's denials ably treated in an article on my former note in the “Christian Observer” for Feb. 1853.) 69.] “An oriental house is usually built round a quadrangular interior court; into which there is a passage (sometimes arched) through the front part of the house, closed next the street by a heavy folding gate, with a small wicket for single persons, kept by a porter.

In the text, the interior court, often paved or flagged, and open to the sky, is the αὐλή where the attendants made a fire; and the passage beneath the front of the house from the street to this court, is the προαύλιον or πυλῶν. xxii. 66 (who probably mixes with this morning meeting of the Sanhedrim some things that took place at their earlier assembly), xxiii. 1. John xviii. 28. The object of this taking counsel, was ἀρετὴ θ. αἰ.—to condemn Him formally to death, and devis the best means for the accomplishment of the sentence. 2.] Πεντ. 3—10.] REMORSE AND SUICIDE OF JUDAS. Peculiar to Matthew. This incident does not throw much light on the motives of Judas. One thing we learn for certain—that our Lord's being condemned, which he inferred from His being handed over to the Roman governor, worked in him remorse, and that suicide was the consequence. Whether this condemnation was expected by him or not, does not here appear; nor have we any means of ascertaining, except from the former sayings of our Lord respecting him. I cannot (see note on ch. xxvi. 14) believe that his intent was other than sordid gain to be achieved by the darkest treachery. To suppose that the condemnation took him by surprise, seems to me to be inconsistent with the spirit of his own confession, ver. 4. There παραδοὺς αἷμα ἁθῶνον expresses his act—his accomplished purpose. The bitter feeling in him now is expressed by ἡμαρτον, of which he is vividly and dreadfully conscious, now that the result has been attained. Observe it was τὰ π. ἀγ. which he brought back—clearly the price of the Lord's betrayal,—not earnest-money merely;—for by this time, nay when he delivered his Prisoner at the house of Annas, he would have in that case received the rest. Observe also ὁ παραδιδὼς αὐτόν, His betrayer, the part. pres. being used as a designation, as in ὁ πειράζων, “the Tempter,” ch. iv. 3.

5.] ἐν τῇ ναῷ—in the holy place, where the priests only might enter. We must conceive him as speaking to them without, and throwing the money into the ναός. ἀπήγατο] hanged, or strangled himself. Another account of the end of Judas was current, which I have cited there. 6.] They said this probably by analogy from Deut. xxiii. 18. τιν. αἷμα, the price given for shedding of blood, the wages of a murderer. 7.] τὸν ἀγρ.

8.] ἀγρ. αἵμ.—πρὶν ἡγ. See Acts i. 19. ἕως τῆς ἡμέρας. This expression shews that a considerable time had elapsed since the event, before Matthew's Gospel was published. 9.] The citation is not from Jeremiah (see ref.), and is probably quoted from memory and unprecisely; we have similar instances in two places in the apology of Stephen, Acts vii. 4, 16,—and in Mark ii. 26. Various means of evading this have been resorted to, which are not worth recounting. Jer. xviii. 1, 2, or perhaps Jer. xxiii. 6—12, may have given rise to it: or it may have arisen from a Jewish idea [see Wordsw. h. l.], “Zechariam habuisset spiritum Jeremias.” The quotation here is very different from the LXX, which see,—and not much more like the Hebrew. I put it to any faithful Christian to say, whether of the two presents the greater obstacle to his faith, the solution given above, or that in Wordsw.'s note, that the name of one prophet is here substituted for that of another, to teach us not to regard the prophets as the authors of their prophecies, but to trace them to divine inspiration.

11—14.] HE IS EXAMINED BY PILATE. Mark xv. 2—5. Luke xxiii. 2—5. John xviii. 29—38. Our narrative of the hearing before Pilate is the least circumstantial of the four—having however two remarkable additional particulars, vv. 19 and 24. John is the fullest in giving the words of our Lord. Compare the notes there.

11.] Before this Pilate had come out and demanded the cause of his being delivered up; the Jews not entering the Prætorium.

The primary accusation against Him seems to have been that He ἀγριον λαον βασιλια εἰποι. This is presupposed in the enquiry of this verse.

οὐ λέγεις is not to be rendered as a doubtful answer—much less with Theophylact, as meaning, “Thou sayest it, not I?” but as a strong affirmative. See above on ch. xvi. 64. 12—14.] This part of the nar-narrative presupposes what this verse and the next distinctly assert, that Pilate was before acquainted with the acts and character of Jesus. 19.] The βῆμα was in a place called in Hebrew Gabbatha, the Pavement—John xix. 13—where however Pilate does not go thither, till after the scourging and mocking of the soldiers. But he may have sat there when he came out in some of his previous interviews with the Jews. ἡ γυνὴ αὐτοῦ.] It had become the custom in Augustus's time for the governors of Provinces to take their wives with them abroad; Cæcina attempted to pass a law forbidding it (Tacit. Ann. iii. 33 ff.), but was vehemently opposed (by Drusus among others) and put down. We know nothing more of this woman than is here related. Tradition gives her the name of Procla or Claudia Procula. In the gospel of Nicodemus, c. 2, we read that Pilate called the Jews and said to them, οἰδατε ὅτι ἡ γυνὴ μου θεοσεβὴς ἐστίν, καὶ μᾶλλον ἰουδαίζει σὺν ὑμῖν. λέγουσιν αὐτῷ Ναί, οἰδαμεν. On the question raised by the words καθημένου δὲ αὐτοῦ ἐπὶ τοῦ βήματος as to the place which this incident holds in the trial, see Tischendorf, Pilati circa Christum judicio, &c., pp. 13 ff. ὁ δίκαιος ἐκείνος is a term which shews that she knew the character for purity and sanctity which Jesus had. In the gospel of Nicodemus, the Jews are made to reply, μὴ οὐκ εἶπαμεν σοὶ ὅτι γόης ἐστίν; ἰδοὺ ὀνειροπόλημα ἔπεμψε πρὸς τὴν γυναῖκά σου. 20.] So Mark also. Luke and John merely give, that they all cried out, &c. The exciting of the crowd seems to have taken place while Pilate was receiving the message from his wife. Ina conveys a mixture of the purport with the purpose of the ἐπισυναγῆς. See note on 1 Cor. xiv. 13. 21.] ἐποικρ. not necessarily to the incitements of the Sanhedrists which he overheard (Meyer), but rather to the state of confusion and indecision which prevailed. 22.] They chose crucifixion as the ordinary Roman punishment for sedition, and because of their hate to Jesus. The double accusative after verbs of doing and saying of or to any one is the common construction. See Kühner, Gr. ii. p. 225. Cf. Xen. Cyr. iii. 2. 15, οὐδὲ πῶποτε ἐπαύοντο πολλὰ κατὰ ἡμᾶς προσῆντες. 23.] γὰρ implies a sort of concession—a placing one's self in the situation of the person addressed, and then requiring a reason for his decision: and is generally found in this connexion, τί γὰρ, in the utterance of impassioned feeling. See Hartung, Partikellehre, i. 479. 24.] Peculiar to Matt. οὐδὲν ὠφελεῖ—rightly rendered in E. V. that he prevailed nothing—not 'that it prevailed nothing.' The custom of scourging before execution was general among the Romans. After the scourging, John xix. 1—16, Pilate made a last attempt to liberate Jesus—

Roman soldiers, whose office the execution

This happened in the guard-room of the cohort: and the narrative of it we may well believe may have come from the cenafterwards deeply impressed at the crucifixion. ³⁰] Possibly the mantle in one of the ordinary soldiers' cloaks.

³⁰] It does not appear whether the purpose of the crown was to wound, or simply for mockery—and equally uncertain is it,
of what kind of thorns it was composed.
The acanthus itself, with its large succulent leaves, is singularly unfit for such a purpose: as is the plant with very long sharp thorns commonly known as spina Christi, being a brittle acacia (robinia),—and the fied persons down. There were four soldiers, John, ver. 23; a centurion and three others.

37.] ³⁷ ἐκεῖ.—is not to be taken as a plusq. perf. — Matthew finishes relating what the soldiers did, and then goes back to the course of the narrative. 'The soldiers' need not even be the nominative case to ³⁷ ἐκεῖ. The 'title' appears to have been written by Pilate (see John, ver. 19) and sent to be affixed on the cross. It is not known whether the affixing of this title was customary. In Dio Cassius (cited by Meyer, but incorrectly), we read of such a title being hung round the neck of a criminal on his way to execution. So also Suet. Domit. 10,—“canibus objecit, cum hoc titulo, ‘Impie locutus parularius:’” and Caligula 82,—“præcedente titulo, qui causam poenæ indicaret.”

On the difference in the four Gospels as to the words of the inscription itself it is hardly worth while to comment, except to remark, that the advocates for the verbal and literal exactness of each gospel may here find an undoubted example of the absurdity of their view, which may serve to guide them in less plain and obvious cases. (See this further noticed in the Prolegg. ch. i. § vi. 18.) A title was written, containing certain words; not four titles, all different, but one, differing probably from all of these four, but certainly from three of them. Let us bear this in mind when the narratives of words spoken, or events, differ in a similar manner. Respecting the title, see further on John, vv. 20—22. 38.] τότε, after the crucifixion of Jesus was accomplished.

These thieves were led out with Jesus, and crucified, perhaps by the same soldiers, or perhaps as Meyer says, inferring this from the καθήμενοι ἐκρούον αὐτὸν ἐκεῖ, ver. 36, by another band.

39—44.] HE IS MOCKED ON THE CROSS. Mark xv. 29—32. Luke xxiii. 35—37; 39—43. Our narrative and that of Mark are from a common source. Luke's is wholly distinct. The whole of these indignities are omitted by John. 39.

οἱ ἄρσται.] These words say nothing as to its being a working-day, or as to the situation of the spot. A matter of so much public interest would be sure to attract a crowd, among whom we find, ver. 41, the chief priests, scribes, and elders. These passers-by were the multitude going in and out of the city, some coming to see, others returning.

called. 46.] See Ps. xxii. 1. The words λεμὰ σαβαχθανί are Chaldee, and not Hebrew. Our Lord spoke them in the ordinary dialect, not in that of the sacred text itself. The weightiest question is, In what sense did He use them? His inner consciousness of union with God must have been complete and indestructible—but, like His higher and holy will, liable to be obscured by human weakness and pain, which at this time was at its very highest. We must however take care not to ascribe all his suffering to bodily pain, however cruel: his soul was in immediate contact with and prospect of death—the wages of sin, which He had taken on Him, but never committed—and the conflict at Gethsemane was renewed. 'He himself,' as the Berleberg Bible remarks (Stier, vi. 442), 'becomes the expositor of the darkness, and shews what it imports.' In the words however, 'My God'—there speaks the same union with the divine Will, and abiding in the everlasting covenant purpose, as in those, 'Not my will, but thine.' These are the only words on the Cross related by Matt. and Mark—and they are related by none besides. The form thee is very seldom used,—only in Judg. xvi. 28 vat., Ezra ix. 6. The LXX here has the usual vocative ὁ θεός: as also Mark. 47.] This was not said by the Roman soldiers, who could know nothing of Elias; nor was it a misunderstanding of the Jewish spectators, who must have well understood the import of ἡλί: nor again was it said in any apprehension, from the supernatural darkness, that Elias might really come (Olsh.); but it was replied in intended mockery, as οὔτος,—'this one among the three,'—clearly indicates.

This is one of the cases where those who advocate an original Hebrew Gospel of Matthew are obliged to suppose that the Greek translator has retained the original words, in order to make the reason of the reply clear. 48.] This was on account of the words 'I thirst,' uttered by our Lord: see John, ver. 28. Mark's account is somewhat different; there the same person gives the vinegar and utters the scoff which follows. This is quite intelligible—contempt mingled with pity would doubtless find a type among the bystanders. There is no need for assuming that the soldiers offering vinegar in Luke, ver. 37, is the same incident as this. Since then, the bodily state of the Redeemer had greatly changed; and what was then offered in mockery, might well be now asked for in the agony of death, and received when presented. I would not however absolutely deny that Luke may be giving a less accurate detail; and may represent this incident by his ver. 37. The ξξος is the posca, sour wine, or vinegar and water, the ordinary drink of the Roman soldiers. On the other particulars, see notes on John. 49.] If we take our account as the strictly accurate one, the rest—in mockery—call upon this person to desist, and wait for Elias to come to save Him: if that of Mark, the giver of the drink calls upon the rest (also in mockery) to let this suffice or to let him (the giver) alone, and wait, &c. The former seems more probable. It is remarkable that the words undeniably interpolated from John should have found their place here before the death of Jesus, and can only be attributed to carelessness, there being no other place here for the insertion of the indignity but this, and the interpolator not observing that in John it is related as inflicted after death.

50.] It has been doubted whether the τεριλεσται of John (ver. 30) and παρεν, εις χ. σου παραριθμαι τ. πν. μου of Luke (ver. 46) are to be identified with this crying out, or to be taken as distinct from it. But a nearer examination of the case will set the doubt at rest. The παρίδωκεν of John (ib.) implies the speech in Luke; which accordingly was that uttered in this φωνῇ μεγάλη. The τεριλεσται was said before; see notes on John.

51—56.] SIGNS FOLLOWING HIS DEATH. Mark xv. 38—41. Luke xxiii. 47—49. The three narratives are essentially distinct. That of Luke is more general—giving only the senses of the centurion's words—twice using the indefinite πάντες—and not specifying the women. The whole is omitted by John. 51.] The 1364 gives solemnity. This was the inner veil, screening off the holy of holies from the holy place, Exod. xxvi. 33: Heb. ix. 2, 3. This circumstance has given rise to much incredulous comment, and that even from men like Schleiermacher. A right and deep view of the O. T. symbolism is required to furnish the key to it; and for this we look in vain among those who set aside that symbolism entirely. That was now accomplished, which was the one and great antitype of all those sacrifices offered in the holy place, in order to gain, as on the great day of atonement (for that day may be taken as the representation of their intent), entrance into the holiest place,—the typical presence of God. What those sacrifices (ceremonially) procured for the Jews (the type of God's universal Church) through their High-priest, was now (really) procured for all men by the sacrifice of Him, who was at once the victim and the High-priest. When Schleiermacher and De Wette assert that no use is made of this event in the Epistle to the Hebrews, they surely cannot have remembered, or not have deeply considered Heb. x. 19—21. Besides, suppose it had been referred to plainly and by name—what would then have been said? Clearly, that this mention was a later insertion, to justify that reference. And almost this latter, Strauss, recognizing the allusion in Heb., actually does. Schleiermacher also asks, how could the event be known, seeing none but priests could have witnessed it, and they would not be likely to betray it? To say nothing of the almost certain spread of the rumour, has he forgotten that (Acts vi. 7) “a great company of the priests were obedient unto the faith?” Neander, who gives this last consideration its weight (but only as a possibility, that some priests them,' is simply ridiculous. The words belong to the whole sentence, not merely to εἰς ἣλθον. ἡγέρθησαν is the result

—not the immediate accompaniment, of the opening of the tomb. It is to prevent this being supposed, that the qualification μετ. τ. f. αὐ. is added. ⁵⁴] τὸν σεισμόν καὶ τὰ γιν. = ὅτι οὕτως ἐξέπνευσεν Mark. Does the latter of these look as if compiled from the former?

The circumstances of our vv. 51—53, except the rending of the veil, are not in the possession of Mark, of the minute accuracy of whose account I have no doubt. His report is that of one man—and that man, more than probably, a convert. Matthew's is of many, and represents their general impression. Luke's is also general. τὰ γινόμενα points to the crying out, as indeed does the οὕτως in Mark:—but see notes there. ⁵⁵]

θεοῦ ἦν—which the Centurion had heard that He gave Himself out for, John xix. 7, and our ver. 43. It cannot be doubtful, I think, that he used these words in the Jewish sense—and with some idea of that which they implied. When Meyer says that he must have used them in a heathen sense, meaning a hero or demi-god, we must first be shewn that υἱὸς θεοῦ was ever so used. I believe Luke's to be a different report: see notes there. ⁵⁵, ⁵⁶.] ἡκολ., the historic aorist in a relative clause, see Acts i. 2: John xi. 30 al. fr.: and Winer, § 40, 5, end:

ἡ Μαγδ., from Magdala: see note on ch. xv. 39. She is not to be confounded with Mary who anointed our Lord, John xii. 1, nor with the woman who did the same, Luke vii. 36: see Luke viii. 2. Map. ἡ τ. 'Ιακ.] The wife of Alphæus or Clopas, John xix. 25: see note on ch. xiii. 55. 'Ιακ., Mark adds τοῦ

Both omit Mary the mother of Jesus:—but we must remember, that if we are to take the group as described at this moment, she was not present, having been, as I believe (see note on John, ver. 27), led away by the beloved Apostle immediately on the speaking of the words, 'Behold thy mother.' And if this view be objected to, yet she could not be named here, nor in Mark, except separately from these three—for she could not have been one of the διακονοῦσαι αὐτῷ.

There must have been also another group, of His disciples, within sight;—e. g. Thomas, who said, 'Except I see in his hands the print of the nails,' &c., and generally those to whom He afterwards shewed his hands and feet as a proof of his identity.

57—61.] JOSEPH OF ARIMATHAEA BEGS, AND BURIES THE BODY OF JESUS. Mark xv. 42—47. Luke xxiii. 50—56. John xix. 38—42. The four accounts, agreeing in substance, are remarkably distinct and independent, as will appear by a close comparison of them. 57.] Before sunset, at which time the sabbath, and that an high day, began: see Deut. xxi. 23. The Roman custom was for the bodies to remain on the crosses till devoured by birds of prey:—‘non pascos in cruce corvos.’ Hor. Epist. i. 16. 48. On the other hand, Josephus, B. J. iv. 5. 2, says, ‘Ιουδαίωv περι γὰρ τὰς τὰς πρόνοιαν ποιουμένων ὥστε καὶ τοὺς ἐκ καταδίκης . . . ἀνασταυρωμένους πρὸ δόντος ἡλίου καθελείν καὶ θάπτειν. ἦλθεν] probably to the Prætorium. Meyer supposes, to the place of execution; which is also possible, and seems supported by the ἦλθεν οὖν καὶ ἦεν John ver. 38, and ἦλθεν δὲ καὶ . . . ib. ver. 39, which certainly was to Golgotha. πλοῦσιος—he was also a counsellor, i. e. one of the Sanhedrim: see Mark, ver. 43: Luke, ver. 51.

‘Αριμαθαίας] Opinions are divided as to whether this was Rama in Benjamin (see ch. ii. 18), or Rama (Ramathaim) in Ephraim, the birth-place of Samuel. The form of the name is more like the latter.

58.] The repetition of τὸ σῶμα is remarkable, and indicates a common origin, in this verse, with Mark, who after ἰδωρήσατο expresses τὸ πρῶμα on account of the expression of Pilate’s surprise, and the change of subject between.

59.] John (ver. 39) mentions the arrival of Nicodemus with an hundred pound weight of myrrh and aloes, in which also the Body was wrapped. The Three are not in possession of this—nor Matthew and John of the subsequent design of the women to embalm It. What wonder if, at such a time, one party of disciples should not have been aware of the doings of another? It is possible that the women, who certainly knew what had been done with the Body (see ver. 61), may have intended to bestow on it more elaborate care, as whatever was done this night was hastied,—see John, vv. 41, 42.

60.] Matt. alone relates that it was Joseph’s own tomb. John, that it was in a garden, and in the place where He was crucified. All, except Mark, notice the newness of the tomb. John does not mention that it belonged to Joseph—but the expression ἐν ᾗ οὐδὲν οὐδὲν ἐτίθη looks as if he knew more than he has thought it necessary to state. His reason for the Body being laid there is, that it was near, and the Preparation rendered haste necessary. But then we may well ask, How should the body of an executed person be laid in a new tomb, without the consent of the owner being first obtained? And who so likely to provide a tomb, as he whose pious care for the Body was so eminent? All that we can determine respecting the sepulchre from the data here furnished is, (1) That it was not a natural cave, but an artificial excavation in the rock. (2) That it was not cut downwards, after the manner of a grave with us, but horizontally, or nearly so, into the face of the rock—this I conceive to be implied in προσκυλίσας λίθ. μίγ. γῇ θύρα τοῦ μν., as also by the use of παρακύπτω John xi.

[61.] Luke mentions more generally the women who came with Him from Galilee; and specifies that they prepared spices and ointments, and rested the sabbath-day according to the commandment.

[62—63.] THE JEWISH AUTHORITIES OBTAIN FROM PILATE A GUARD FOR THE SEPULCHRE. Peculiar to Matthew.

[62. τῇ ἑρ.] not on that night, but on the next day. A difficulty has been found in its being called the day μετὰ τὴν παρασκευὴν, considering that it was itself the sabbath, and the greatest sabbath in the year. But I believe the expression to be carefully and purposely used. The chief priests, &c. did not go to Pilate on the sabbath,—but in the evening, after the termination of the sabbath. Had the Evangelist said ἥτις ἐστὶ τὸ σάββατον, the incongruity would at once appear of such an application being made on the sabbath—and he therefore designates the day as the first after that, which, as the day of the Lord's death, the παρασκευή, was uppermost in his mind. The narrative following has been much impugned, and its historical accuracy very generally given up by even the best of the German Commentators (Olshausen, Meyer; also De Wette, Hase, and others). The chief difficulties found in it seem to be: (1) How should the chief priests, &c. know of His having said, 'in three days I will rise again,' when the saying was hid even from His own disciples? The answer to this is easy. The meaning of the saying may have been, and was, hid from the disciples; but the fact of its having been said could be no secret. Not to lay any stress on John ii. 19, we have the direct prophecy of Matt. xii. 40—and besides this, there would be a rumour current, through the intercourse of the Apostles with others, that He had been in the habit of so saying. As to the understanding of the words, we must remember that hatred is keener sighted than love;—that the raising of Lazarus would shew, what sort of a thing rising from the dead was to be;—and that the fulfilment of the Lord's announcement of his crucifixion would naturally lead them to look further, to what more he had announced. (2) How should the women, who were solicitous about the removal of the stone, not have been still more so about its being sealed, and a guard set? The answer to this has been given above—they were not aware of the circumstance, because the guard was not set till the evening before. There would be no need of the application before the approach of the third day—it is only made for a watch ἕως τῆς τρίτης ἡμέρας, ver. 64—and it is not probable that the circumstance would transpire that night—certainly it seems not to have done so. (3) That Gamaliel was of the council, and if such a thing as this, and its sequel ch.

xxviii. 11—15, had really happened, he need not have expressed himself doubtfully, Acts v. 39, but would have been certain that this was from God. But, first, it does not necessarily follow that every member of the Sanhedrim was present and applied to Pilate, or even had they done so, that all bore a part in the act of ch. xxviii. 12. One who, like Joseph, had not consented to their deed before—and we may safely say that there were others such—would naturally withdraw himself from further proceedings against the person of Jesus. On Gamaliel and his character, see note on Acts, l. c. (4) Had this been so, the three other Evangelists would not have passed over so important a testimony to the Resurrection. But surely we cannot argue in this way—for thus every important fact narrated by one Evangelist alone must be rejected—e. g. (which stands in much the same relation) the satisfaction of Thomas,—and other such narrations. Till we know much more about the circumstances under which, and the scope with which, each Gospel was compiled, all à priori arguments of this kind are good for nothing.

65.] εχεται—either 1), indicative, Ye have:—but then the question arises, What guard had they? and if they had one, why go to Pilate? Perhaps we must understand some detachment placed at their disposal during the feast—but there does not seem to be any record of such a practice. That the guards were under the Sanhedrim is plain from ch. xxviii. 11, where they make their report ('ut mos militie, factum esse quod imperasset,' Tacitus, Ann. i. 6), not to Pilate, but to the chief priests:—or 2), as De Wette and Meyer take it, imperative; which doubtless it may be, see 2 Tim. i. 13 and note: and the sense here on that hypothesis would be, Take a body of men for a guard. And to this latter I now rather incline, on account of the order of the words, in which εχεται seems to have an emphasis hardly satisfied on the other view. ως οἰδατε—as you know how:—in the best manner you can. There is no irony in the words, as has been supposed. μετὰ belongs to ησφαλ. and implies the means whereby, as in reff. So Thucyd. viii. 73,—Υπέρβολον . . . ἀποστεινόνται μετὰ Χαρμίνου ἐνδὸς τῶν στρατηγῶν,—iii. 66, οὐ μετὰ τοῦ πλῆθους ὑμῶν εἰσελθόντες,—v. 82, ἡ κατὰ θάλασσαν μετὰ τῶν Ἀθηναίων ἐπαγωγῇ τῶν ἐπιτηδίων. Duker, on the first of these, remarks, 'μετὰ τινος fieri dicuntur, quæ alicujus voluntate, auxilio, et consilio fiunt.' The sealing was by means of a cord or string passing across the stone at the mouth of the sepulchre, and fastened at either end to the rock by sealing-clay.

CHAP. XXVIII. 1—10.] JESUS HAVING RISEN FROM THE DEAD, APPEARS TO THE WOMEN. Mark xvi. 1—8. Luke xiv. 1—12. John xx. 1—10. The independence and distinctness of the four narratives in this part have never been questioned, and indeed herein lie its principal difficulties. With regard to them, I refer to what I have said in the Prolegomena, that supposing us to be acquainted with every thing said and done, in its order and exactness, we should doubtless be able to reconcile, or account for, the present forms of the narratives; but not having this key to the harmonizing of them, all attempts to do so in minute particulars must be full of arbitrary assumptions, and carry no certainty with them. And I may remark, that of all harmonies, those of the incidents of these chapters are to me the most unsatisfactory. Giving their compilers all credit for the best intentions, I confess they seem to me to weaken instead of strengthening the evidence, which now rests (speaking merely objectively) on the unexceptionable testimony of three independent narrators, and of one, who besides was an eye-witness of much that happened. If we are to compare the four, and ask which is to be taken as most nearly reporting the exact words and incidents, on this there can I think be no doubt. On internal as well as external ground, that of John takes the highest place: but not, of course, to the exclusion of those parts of the narrative which he does not touch.

The improbability that the Evangelists had seen one another's accounts, becomes, in this part of their Gospels, an impossibility. Here and there we discern traces of a common narration as the ground of their reports, as e. g. Matt. vv. 5—8: Mark vv. 5—8, but even these are very few.

As I have abandoned all idea of harmonizing throughout, I will beg the student to compare carefully the notes on the other Gospels. 1.] ἐφ' ἃ σαβ.

not, 'at the end of the week.' The words σαββάτων and μίαν σαββ. are opposed, both being days. At the end of the Sabbath. There is some little difficulty here, because the end of the sabbath (and of the week) was at sunset the night before. It is hardly to be supposed that St. Matthew means the evening of the sabbath, though ἐσπέρας is used of the day beginning at sunset (Luke xxiii. 54, and note). It is best to interpret a doubtful expression in unison with the other testimonies, and to suppose that here both the day and the breaking of the day are taken in their natural, not their Jewish sense.

μίαν σαββ. is a Hebraism; the Rabbinical writings use יום, יום, יום, &c., affixing יום to each, for Sunday, Monday, Tuesday, &c. Map. ἡ Μ. κ. ἡ ἑλ. Μ.] In Mark, Salome also. John speaks of Mary Magdalene alone. See notes there.

Θεωρ. τ. τ.] It was to anoint the Body, for which purposes they had bought, since the end of the Sabbath, ointments and spices, Mark. In Mark it is after the rising of the sun; in John, while yet dark; in Luke, at dim dawn: the two last agree with our text.

2.] This must not be taken as pluperfect, which would be altogether inconsistent with the text. καὶ ἰδοὺ—ἐγένετο must mean that the women were witnesses of the earthquake, and that which happened.

σεισμός was not properly an earthquake, but was the sudden opening of the tomb by the descending Angel, as the γὰρ shews. The rolling away was not done naturally, but by a shock, which = σεισμός.

It must not be supposed that the Resurrection of our Lord took place at this time, as sometimes imagined, and represented in paintings. It had taken place before;—ἡγείσθη κ.τ.λ., are the words of the Angel. It was not for Him, to whom (see John xx. 19, 26) the stone was no hindrance, but for the women and His disciples, that it was rolled away.

Mark, a young man in a white robe was sitting in the tomb on the right hand;
in Luke two men in shining raiment (see Acts i. 10) appeared (ἐπενήσαν) to them.
John relates, that Mary Magdalene looked into the tomb and saw (but this must have been afterwards) two angels in white sitting one at the head, the other at the feet where the Body had lain. All attempts to deny the angelic appearances, or ascribe them to later tradition, are dishonest and absurd. That related in John is as definite as either of the others, and he certainly had it from Mary Magdalene herself.

7.] This appearance in Galilee had been foretold before his death, see ch. xxvi. 32. It is to be observed that Matthew records only this one appearance to the Apostles, and in Galilee.
It appears strange that this should be the entire testimony of Matthew: for it seems hardly likely that he would omit those important appearances in Jerusalem when the Apostles were assembled, John xx.
19, 26, or that one which was closed by the Ascension. But perhaps it may be in accord with his evident design of giving the general form and summary of each series of events, rather than their characteristic details. See below on ver. 20.

to be part of the message to the disciples: not spoken to the women directly, but certainly indirectly including them. The idea of their being merely messengers to the Apostles, without bearing any share in the promise, is against the spirit of the context: see further in note on ver. 17. ¹² καὶ αὐτῶν ἐπὶ τὴν πόλιν is to give solemnity to the command. These words are peculiar to Matthew, and are a mark of accuracy.

Mark even says οὐδεὶς οὐδὲν ἔκρινεν ἰφοβοῦντε γάρ. But (see above) it does not therefore follow that the narratives are inconsistent. Mark's account (see note there) is evidently broken off suddenly; and Luke's (see also note there) appears to have been derived from one of those who went to Emmaus, who had evidently but an imperfect knowledge of what happened before they left the city. This being taken into account, we may fairly require that the judgment should be suspended in lack of further means of solving the difficulty. ¹² ἐκ τ. π. partly in fear and as suppliants, for the Lord says μὴ φοβείσθε, —but shewing also the χαρὰ with which that fear was mixed (ver. 8), —joy at having recovered Him whom they

The repetition of this injunction by the Lord has been thought to indicate that this is a portion of another narrative invoven here, and may possibly belong to the same incident as that in ver. 7. But all probability is against this: the passages are distinctly consecutive, and moreover both are in the well-known style of Matthew (e. g. καὶ ἰδοὺ in both). There is perhaps more probability that this may be the same appearance as that in John xx. 11—18, on account of μὴ μου ἀπτεν there and τοὺς ἀδελφ. μου, —but in our present imperfect state of information, this must remain a mere probability.

Eisenmenger (Entdecktes Judenthum, cited by Meyer and De Wette) gives an expansion of this lie of the Jews from the book called Toldoth Jeschu.

18—20.] APPEARANCE OF THE LORD ON A MOUNTAIN IN GALILEE. This journey into Galilee was after the termination of the feast, allowing two first days of the week, on which the Lord appeared to the assembled apostles (John xx. 19, 26), to elapse. It illustrates the imperfect and fragmentary nature of the materials out of which our narrative is built, that the appointment of this mountain as a place of assembly for the eleven has not been mentioned, although τὸ ὅρος οὗ seems to imply that it has. Stier well remarks (Reden Jesu, vii. 209) that in this verse Matthew gives a hint of some interviews having taken place previously to this in Galilee. And it is important to bear this in mind, as suggesting, if not the solution, at least the ground of solution, of the difficulties of this passage. Ver. 17 seems to present an instance of this imperfect and fragmentary narrative. The impression given by it is that the majority of the eleven worshipped Him, but some doubted (not, whether they should worship Him; which is absurd and not implied in the word. On ol δὲ, cf. ch. xxvi. 67. ὥχοντο εἰς Δεκίλειαν, οἱ δ' ἐκ Μίγαπα, Xen. Hell. i. 2. 14: see also Anab. i. 5. 13). This however would hardly be possible, after the two appearances at Jerusalem in John xx. We are therefore obliged to conclude that others were present. Whether these others were the '500 brethren at once' of whom Paul speaks 1 Cor. xv. 6, or some other disciples, does not appear. Olshausen and Stier suppose, from the previous announcement of this meeting, and the repetition of that announcement by the angel, and by our Lord, that it probably included all the disciples of Jesus; at least, all who would from the nature of the case be brought together. 18. προσελθ. They appear to have first seen Him at a distance, probably on the top of the mountain. This whole introduction, προσελθ. ἰδὼν. αὐτ. λέγ. forbids us to suppose that the following words are a mere compendium of what was said on various occasions. Like the opening of ch. v., it carries with it a direct assertion that what follows, was spoken then, and there. Ἰδὼν μοι κ.τ.λ.] The words are a reference to ref. Dan. (LXX), which compare. Covenant, in the Unity of the Holy Spirit. Now first is this covenant, in its fulness, proclaimed upon earth. The Resurrection was its last seal—the Ascension was the taking possession of the Inheritance. But the Inheritance is already won; and the Heir is only remaining on earth for a temporary purpose—the assuring His joint-heirs of the verity of his possession. ‘All power in heaven and earth,’ see Eph. i. 20—23; Col. ii. 10; Heb. i. 6; Rom. xiv. 9; Phil. ii. 9—11; 1 Pet. iii. 22.

19.] οὖν (in rec.) is probably a gloss, but an excellent one. It is the glorification of the Son by the Father through the Spirit, which is the foundation of the Church of Christ in all the world. And when we baptize into the Name (i. e. into the fulness of the consequence of the objective covenant, and the subjective confession) of Father, Son, and Holy Ghost, it is this which forms the ground and cause of our power to do so—that this flesh of man, of which God hath made πάντα τὰ ἔθνη, is glorified in the Person of our Redeemer, through whom we all have access by one Spirit to the Father. πορ. μαθ.]

Demonstrably, this was not understood as spoken to the Apostles only, but to all the brethren. Thus we read, πάντες διεσπάσαν . . . πλὴν τῶν ἀποστόλων (Acts viii. 2): οἱ μὲν οὖν διασπαρόντες διῆλθον εὐαγγελίζοντες τὸν λόγον (ibid. ver. 4).

There is peculiar meaning in μαθητεύσατε. All power is given me—go therefore and . . . subdue? Not so: the purpose of the Lord is to bring men to the knowledge of the truth—to work on and in their hearts, and lift them up to be partakers of the divine Nature. And therefore it is not ‘subdue,’ but make disciples of (see below). πάντα τὰ ἔθνη again is closely connected with πᾶσα ἐξουσία ἐν τῇ γῇ.

πάντα τὰ ἔθνη] all nations, including the Jews. It is absurd to imagine that in these words of the Lord there is implied a rejection of the Jews, in direct variance with his commands elsewhere, and also with the world-wide signification of ἐν τῇ γῇ above. Besides, the (temporary) rejection of the Jews consists in this, that they are numbered among πάντα τὰ ἔθνη, and not a peculiar people any longer: and are become, in the providence of God, the subjects of that preaching, of which by original title they ought to have been the promulgators. We find the first preachers of the gospel, so far from excepting the Jews, uniformly bearing their testimony to them first. With regard to the difficulty which has been raised on these words,—that if they had been thus spoken by the Lord, the Apostles would never have had any doubt about the admission of the Gentiles into the Church,—I would answer, with Ebrard, Stier, De Wette, Meyer, and others, ‘that the Apostles never had any doubt whatever about admitting Gentiles,—only whether they should not be circumcised first.’ In this command, the prohibition of ch. x. 5 is for ever removed. βαπτίζον-τες] Both these present participles are the conditioning components of the imperative aor. preceding. The μαθητεῖν consists of two parts—the initiatory, admissory rite, and the subsequent teaching. It is much to be regretted that the rendering of μαθ. ‘teach,’ has in our Bibles clouded the meaning of these important words. It will be observed that in our Lord’s words, as in the Church, the process of ordinary discipleship is from baptism to instruction—i. e. is, admission in infancy to the covenant, and growing up into τῆς πάντας κ.τ.λ.—the exception being, what circumstances rendered so frequent in the early church, instruction before baptism, in the case of adults. On this we may also remark, that baptism as known to the Jews included, just as it does in the Acts (ch. xvi. 15, 33), whole households—wives and children.

Vol. I.

As regards the command itself, no unprejudiced reader can doubt that it regards the outward rite of BAPTISM, so well known in this gospel as having been practised by John, and received by the Lord Himself. And thus it was immediately, and has been ever since, understood by the Church. As regards all attempts to explain away this sense, we may say—even setting aside the testimony furnished by the Acts of the Apostles,—that it is in the highest degree improbable that our Lord should have given, at a time when He was summing up the duties of his Church in such weighty words, a command couched in figurative or ambiguous language—one which He must have known would be interpreted by his disciples, now long accustomed to the rite and its name, otherwise than He intended it. εἰς τὸ ὄν. . .] Reference is apparently made to the Baptism of the Lord himself, where the whole Three Persons of the Godhead were in manifestation.

Not τὸ ὄνυμα—but τὸ ὄνομα—setting forth the Unity of the Godhead.

It is unfortunate again here that our English Bibles do not give us the force of this εἰς. It should have been into, (as in Gal. iii. 27 al.) both here and in 1 Cor. x. 2, and wherever the expression is used. It imports, not only a subjective recognition hereafter by the child of the truth implied in τὸ ὄνομα, ε.τ.λ. but an objective admission into the covenant of Redemption—a putting on of Christ. Baptism is the contract of espousal (Eph. v. 26) between Christ and his Church. Our word 'in' being retained both here and in our formula of Baptism, it should always be remembered that the Sacramental declaration is contained in this word; that it answers (as Stier has well observed, vii. 268) to the verbo datus in the other Sacrament. On the difference between the baptism of John, and Christian baptism, see notes on ch. iii. 11; Acts xviii. 25; xix. 1—5.

20.] Even in the case of the adult, this teaching must, in greater part, follow his baptism; though as we have seen (on ver. 19), in his exceptional case, some of it must go before. For this teaching is nothing less than the building up of the whole man into the obedience of Christ. In these words, inasmuch as the then living disciples could not teach all nations, does the Lord found the office of Preachers in his Church, with all that belongs to it,—the duties of the minister, the school-teacher, the scripture reader. This 'teaching' is not merely the sermon of the gospel—not mere proclamation of the good news—but the whole catechetical office of the Church upon and in the baptized.

καὶ ἰδοὺ . . .] These words imply and set forth the Ascension, the manner of which is not related by our Evangelist.

ἐγὼ—I, in the fullest sense: not the Divine Presence, as distinguished from the Humanity of Christ. His Humanity is with us likewise. The vine lives in the branches. Stier remarks (vii. 277) the contrast between this 'I am with you,' and the view of Nicodemus (John iii. 2) 'no man can do these miracles—except God be with him.' παρ' ὑμ.] mainly, by the promise of the Father (Luke xxiv. 49) which He has poured out on his Church. But the presence of the Spirit is the effect of the presence of Christ—and the presence of Christ is part of the ἰδοὺ above—the effect of the well-pleasing of the Father. So that the mystery of His name Ἐμμανουήλ (with which, as Stier remarks, this Gospel begins and ends) is fulfilled—God is with us. And τὰς ἡμέρας—all the (appointed) days—for they are numbered by the Father, though by none but Him. ἕως τῆς συντ. τ.

αί.—that time of which they had heard in so many parables, and about which they had asked, ch. xxiv. 3—the completion of the state of time. After that, He will be no more properly speaking with us, but we with Him (John xvii. 24) where He is.

To understand μεθ' ὑμῶν only of the Apostles and their (?) successors, is to destroy the whole force of these most weighty words. Descending even into literal exactness, we may see that διδάσκοντες αὐτοὺς τηρεῖν πάντα ὅσα ἐνεταλάμην ὑμῖν, makes αὐτοὺς into ὑμεῖς, as soon as they are μαθητευμένοι. The command is to the UNIVERSAL CHURCH—to be performed, in the nature of things, by her ministers and teachers, the manner of appointing which is not here prescribed, but to be learnt in the unfoldings of Providence recorded in the Acts of the Apostles, who by his special ordinance were the founders and first builders of that Church—but whose office, on that very account, precluded the idea of succession or renewal.

That Matthew does not record the fact or manner of the Ascension, is not to be used as a ground for any presumptions regarding the authenticity of the records of it which we possess. The narrative here is suddenly brought to a termination: that in John ends with an express declaration of its incompleteness. What reasons there may have been for the omission, either subjective, in the mind of the author of the Gospel, or objective, in the fragmentary character of the apostolic reports which are here put together, it is wholly out of our power, in this age of the world, to determine. As before remarked, the fact itself is here and elsewhere in this Gospel (see ch. xxii. 44; xxiv. 30; xxv. 14, 31; xxvi. 64) clearly implied.

CHAP. I. 1—8.] THE PREACHING AND BAPTISM OF JOHN. Mt. iii. 1—12. Lk. iii. 1—17. The object of Mark being to relate the official life and ministry of our Lord, he begins with His baptism; and as a necessary introduction to it, with the preaching of John the Baptist. His account of John's baptism has many phrases in common with both Mt. and Lk.; but from the additional prophecy quoted in ver. 2, is certainly independent and distinct (see Prolegomena to the Gosp. ch. I. § ii.).

1. ἀρχὴ κ.τ.λ.] This is probably a title to what follows, as Mat. i. 1, and not connected with ver. 4, as Fritzsche and

Lachm., nor with ver. 2, as Meyer. It is simpler and gives more majesty to the exordium, to put a period at the end of ver. 1, and make the citation from the prophet a new and confirmatory title.

But if χριστοῦ follows (Rom. i. 9; xv. 19: 1 Cor. ix. 12, al.), it may be either genit. of the subject (auctoris) or of the object: and only the context can determine. Here it decides for the latter (vv. 2—8). Render there-

^{12, 13.]} TEMPTATION OF JESUS. Mt. iv. 1—11. Lk. iv. 1—13. ^{12, 13.]} ἐκβάλλω = ἀνάγω Mt., = ἀγω Lk. It is a more forcible word than either of these to express the mighty and cogent impulse of the Spirit. σατανᾶ = διαβ. Mt. Lk.; see note, Mt. iv. 1. It seems to have been permitted to the evil one to tempt our Lord during the whole of the 40 days, and of this we have here, as in Lk., an implied assertion. The additional intensity of temptation at the end of that period, is expressed in Mt. by the tempter coming to Him—becoming visible and audible. Perhaps the being with the beasts may point to one form of temptation, viz. that of terror, which was practised on Him:—but of the inward trials who may speak? οἱ ἄγγ., as τῶν θηρ. generic.

There is nothing here to contradict the fact spoken of in Mt. and Lk., as De W. maintains. Our Evangelist perhaps implies it in the last words of ver. 13. It is remarkable that those Commentators who are fondest of maintaining that Mk. constructed his narrative out of those of Mt. and Lk. (De W., Meyer) are also most keen in pointing out what they call irreconcilable differences between him and them. No apportionment of these details to the various successive parts of the temptation is given by our Evangelist. They are simply stated to have happened, compendiously.

i. 1) which henceforth shall be proclaimed in all the world till the end comes." (Stier, R. J. i. 57.) καὶ πιστ.] These words are in Mk. only. They furnish us an interesting characteristic of the difference between the preaching of John, which was that of repentance—and of our Lord, which was repentance and faith. It is not in Himself as the Saviour that this faith is yet preached: this He did not proclaim till much later in his ministry: but in the fulfilment of the time and approach of the kingdom of God. ἐν is not instrumental (as Fritzsche), 'by means of the Gospel:' but in the Gospel, which, in its completion, sets forth Jesus Christ as the object of faith. "The object of the faith is conceived as that on which the faith lays hold." Meyer.

16—20.] CALLING OF PETER, ANDREW, JAMES, AND JOHN. Mt. iv. 18—22. Almost verbatim as Mat. The variations are curious: after Σίμωνα, Mk. omits τὸν λεγ. Πίτερ. —although the name was prophetically given by our Lord before this, in John i. 43, it perhaps was not actually given, till the twelve became a distinct body, see ch. iii. 16. Mt. has εἰς τὴν θ., for our ἐν τ. θ., an inconceivable variation, if one copied the other, as is also ἀμφιβάλλ. for βάλλ. ἀμφιβληστρον. The παράγων παρὰ, and the ἀμφιβ. ἐν τ. θαλ. are noticed by Meyer as belonging to the graphic delineation which this Evangelist loves. 17.] γενέσθαι is here inserted before ἄλεις for minute accuracy.

19.] μετὰ Z. r. παρ. ἀφ. (Mt.) is omitted here, and Z. inserted below, where Mt. has simply r. παρ. καὶ αὐτούς, these also, as well as the former pair of brothers. It belongs only to ἐν τῇ πλοίῳ, not to the following clause. 20.] μετὰ τῶν μισθ.

is inserted for particularity, and perhaps to soften the leaving their father alone. It gives us a view of the station of life of Zebedee and his sons; they were not poor fishermen, but had hired servants. Mt.

has ἠκολούθησ. αὐτ. Now may we not venture to say that both these accounts came from Peter originally? Matthew's an earlier one, taught (or given in writing perhaps) without any definite idea of making it part of a larger work; but this carefully corrected and rendered accurate, even to the omitting the name Peter, which though generally known, and therefore mentioned in the oral account, was perhaps not yet formally given,
and must be omitted in the historical.

iv. 31—37. 21.] Not immediately after the preceding. The calling of the Apostles, the Sermon on the Mount, the 22.] A formula occurring entire at substance, the second also,—in the cor-

23—28. ε. θ. εν πν.] The use of the prep. in this connexion is unusual:
see ref. I think the best account of it is, that it falls under a large class of usages of εν, expressing the element in which the man lived and moved, as possessed and interpenetrated by the evil spirit,—as in the common expressions εν επιφ, εν χριστῳ, cf. 2 Cor. xii. 2, and Acts xvii. 28. This account occurs in Lk. iv. 33—37, nearly verbatim: for the variations, see there. It is very important for our Lord's official life, as shewing that He rejected and forbade all testimony to his Person, except that which He came on

James, ibid. 38.] ἐξῆλ = ἀπεσράλην, Lk.: not 'undertook this journey.' He had not yet begun any journey, and it cannot apply to ἐξῆλθεν above, for that was not to any city, nor to preach. The word has its more solemn sense, as in reff. Jn., though of course not understood then by the hearers. To deny this, as Meyer, is certainly not safe. 39.] See on Mt. iv. 23: also on Luke iv. 44.

41.] σπλαγχνισθεῖς gives the reason of ιερειας: Jesus being moved with compassion stretched out his hand and touched him. This is characteristic of St. Mark.

43.] ἐξεβαλεν need not necessarily imply that the healing was in a house (Meyer); it might have been in a city, as in Lk.

44.] σεαυτόν, being prefixed to the verb, has an emphasis: trouble not thyself with talking to others, but go complete thine own case by getting thyself formally declared pure.

45.] ἤρξατο, he lost no time in doing it. τὸν λόγον] not, 'what Jesus had said to him,' but the account of his healing. ἤρχοντο tells us more than ἦλθεν would have done. Our Lord did not wish to put a stop to the multitudes seeking Him, but only to avoid that kind of concourse which would have beset Him in the towns: the seeking to Him for teaching and healing still went on, and that from all parts.

Wordsworth believes “these minute notices . . . to be recorded by the Evangelist with a studied design, lest it should be supposed that, because he incorporates so much which is in St. Matthew’s gospel, he was only a copyist: and in order to shew that he did so because he knew from ocular testimony that St. Matthew’s narrative was adequate and accurate.” I mention this, to shew to what shifts the advocates of the theory of the “interdependence” of the Evangelists

Those who bore the paralytic ascended the stairs which led direct from the street to the flat roof of the house, and let him down through the tiles (διὰ τῶν κεραμῶν, Luke).

15.] The entertainment was certainly in Levi's house, not as Meyer, al., in that of our Lord, which last is a pure fiction, and is not any where designated in the Gospel accounts. Certainly the καλεῖσαι, ver. 17, gives no countenance to the view. Our Lord, and those following Him as disciples, were ordinarily entertained where He was invited, which will account for ἠκολούθησεν αὐτῷ:—and the change of subject in the two, αὐτόν and αὐτοῦ, is no uncommon thing: see a similar change in Lk. xix. 3, where to be consistent Meyer ought to understand ὅτι τῷ ἡλ. μικ. ἦν of our Lord. To help out his interpretation he strangely enough makes καλεῖσαι ver. 17, mean 'to invite.' ἦσαν γὰρ . . . αὐτῷ, peculiar to Mk. 15.] ἰδόντες αὐτ. ἰδθ., having observed Him eating; but not to be literally pressed. The question was after the feast, at which, being in the house of a Publican, they were not present.

18. καὶ ἦσαν κ.λ.λ.] Mk. here gives a notice for the information of his readers, as in ch. vii. 3, which places shew that his Gospel was not written for the use of Jews. It appears from this account, which is here the more circumstantial, that the Pharisees and disciples of John asked the question in the third person, as of others. In Mt. it is the disciples of John, and they join ἡμεῖς καὶ οἱ Φα. In Lk., it is the Pharisees and Scribes, and they ask as here. Mey. understands it, that the disciples of John and the Pharisees were at that particular time keeping a fast, and that this gave occasion to the question. The verb subst. with the part. may mean this, and Mk. himself apparently uses it so, ch. x. 32, and xiv. 4: but much more frequently it describes a practice or state, e. g. ἡν

19.] ὅσον . . . νηστεύειν, this repetition, contained neither in Mt. nor Lk., is inconsistent with the design of an abridger; and sufficiently shews the primary authority of this report, as also the ἐν ἐκείνῃ τῇ ἡμ. ver. 20. St. Mark especially loves these solemn repetitions: cf. ch. ix. 42 ff. It is strange to see such a Commentator as De Wette calling the ἐν ἐκείνῃ τῇ ἡμ. a proof of carelessness. It is a touching way, as Mayer well observes, of expressing 'in that atra dies.'

23—28.] THE DISCIPLES PLUCK EARS OF CORN ON THE SABBATH. Mt. xii. 1—8. Lk. vi. 1—5. The same may be said of the three accounts as in the last case, with continually fresh evidence of their entire independence of one another.

23. παρα- . . . δια] He passed by, or journeyed (so our Evangelist uses the word, see reff.) through, &c.

εδον ποιουν τ.λ. is matter of detail and minute depiction. The interpretation of this narrative given by Meyer, which I still believe to be an entirely mistaken one, I cannot pass over so slightly as I did in my first edition. He urges the strict classical sense of εδον ποιουν, 'to make a way,' viam munire, or sternere, and insists on the sense conveyed by our narrative being, as distinguished from those in || Mt., Lk., that the disciples made a way for themselves through the wheat field by plucking the ears of corn, further maintaining, that there is no allusion here to their having eaten the grains of wheat, as in || Mt., Lk. But (1) the foundation on which all this is built is insecure. For εδον ποιουν in the LXX does undoubtedly mean 'to make one's journey,' representing the Heb. הָיָה נֶסֶח, in Judg. xvii. 8 (examples are also quoted in the lex. from Xenophon [the roman-cer]'s Ephesiaca and from Polyseus). And (2) as to no allusion being made to their having eaten the corn, how otherwise could the χριστιαν εχειν have been common to the disciples and to David? Could it be said that any necessity compelled them to clear the path by pulling up the overhanging stalks of corn? How otherwise could the remarkable addition in our narrative, ver. 27, at all bear upon the case?

xiii. 28: Rom. ii. 14. Meyer thus accounts for it—that in later Greek the av became completely attached to the δρε, and the whenever was treated as merely an expression of time—so that in German it would not be 'wenn sie Jhn irgend sahen,' but 'wenn irgend sie Jhn sahen.'

The unclean spirits are here spoken of in the person of those possessed by them, and the two fused together: for as it was impossible that any but the spirits could have known that He was the Son of God, so it was the material body of the possessed which fell down before Him, and their voice which uttered the cry: see note on Mt. viii. 32.
The notion of the semi-rationalists, that the sick identified themselves with the demons (Meyer) is at once refuted by the universal agreement of the testimony given on such occasions, that Jesus was the Son of God.

13—19.] THE APPOINTMENT OF THE TWELVE, AND ITS PURPOSES. Mt. x. 1—4. Lk. vi. 12—16. See Lk., where we learn that He went up overnight to pray, and called his disciples to Him when it was day,—and notes on Mt. On τὰ ἔσπερ see Mt. v. 1. 14.] ἐποίησεν, nominated,—set apart: see reff. We have here the most distinct intimation of any, of the reason of this appointment.

18.] καὶ ἔκ. . . . for Σίμωνα, ὃ ἐστ. . . .

On the list of the Apostles, see note at Mt. x. 2. The name, according to Mk., seems to be now first given. This, at all events, does not look like the testimony of Peter: but perhaps the words are not to be so accurately pressed.

17.] Βοανηργές = $\beta\alpha$ —Shava being expressed by $\alpha\epsilon$ in Aramaic (Meyer, from Lightf.),—perhaps on account of their vehement and zealous disposition, of which we see marks Lk. ix. 54: Mk. ix. 38; x. 37: see also 2 Jn. 10; but this is uncertain. ἐνόματα—since both bore the name, and the Hebrew word is plural.

[There is an interesting notice of the catalogues of the Apostles, and the questions arising out of them, in the Lectures of Bleek on the three Gospels, published since his death by Holzmann, Leipzig,

1862.]

20—25.] CHARGES AGAINST JESUS,—OF MADNESS BY HIS RELATIONS,—OF DEMONIAL POSSESSION BY THE SCRIBES. HIS REPLIES. Mt. xii. 22—37, 46—50. Lk. xi. 14—26; viii. 19—21. Our Lord had just cast out a deaf and dumb spirit (see notes on Mt.) in the open air (Mt., ver. 23), and now they retire into the house. The omission of this, wholly inexplicable if Mk. had had either Mt. or Lk. before him, belongs to the fragmentary character of his Gospel. The common accounts of the compilation of this Gospel are most capricious and absurd. In one place, Mk. omits a discourse—'because it was not his purpose to relate discourses;'—in another he gives a discourse, omitting the occasion which led to it, as here. The real fact being, that the sources of Mark's Gospel are generally of the highest order, and most direct, but the amount of things contained very scanty and discontinuous: see Prolegg. ch. iii. § viii. 20. $\alpha\epsilon$ —resumed from ch. ii. 2. $\alpha\epsilon$ —showing that one of the αἱρεῖ is the narrator.

21.] Peculiar to Mark. $\alpha\epsilon$ παρ' αὐτοῦ = his relations, beyond a doubt—for the sense is resumed by $\alpha\epsilon$ in ver. 31: see reff. ἐξῆλθ. (perhaps from Nazareth,—or, answering to John ii. 12, from Capernaum), set out: see ch.

They had doubtless heard of the accusation of his having a demon: which we must suppose not to have first begun after this, but to have been going on throughout this course of miracles.

The understanding this that his disciples went out to repress the crowd, for they said, 'He is mad,' is as contrary to Greek as to sense. It would require at least αὐτοῖς and ἐξίστησαν, or τὸν δῆλον for αὐτόν, and would even then give no intelligible meaning. ²³] οἱ is strikingly declared by this simple way of putting the question: see note on Mt. The expression must not be taken as meaning, Can one devil cast out another? The σατανᾶς and σατανᾶν are the same person: cf. ver. 26.

28.] ἀλλὰ τῷ. ἔχει, peculiar to Mk.

29.] The putting of πάντα first, and separating it from its noun by the intervening words, gives it a prominent emphasis.

30. αἰώνιον ᾠμαρτήματος] Beza explains αἰώνιον by 'nunquam delendi.' It is to the critical treatment of the sacred text that we owe the restoration of such important and deep-reaching expressions as this. It finds its parallel in ἀποθανέσθαι ἐν ταῖς ᾠμαρτίαις ὑμῶν, Jn. viii. 24.

Kuinoel's idea, quoted and adopted by Wordsw., that ᾠμαρτημα means in the LXX the punishment of sin, seems to be entirely unfounded. And as to its being "a Novatian error to assert that sin is αἰώνιον" (Wordsw.), it is at all events a legitimate inference from οὐκ ἔχει ᾠφεισιν εἰς τὸν αἰῶνα. If a sin remains unremitted for ever, what is it but eternal?

30.] explains the ground and meaning of this awful denunciation of the Lord.

have so often noticed: which is wholly inexplicable on the ordinary suppositions. In this case the vehicles of the parable in Mt. and Mk. (see Mt. vv. 1—3; Mk. vv. 1, 2) bear a strong, almost verbal, resemblance. Such a parable would be carefully treasured in all the Churches as a subject of catechetical instruction: and, in general, in proportion to the popular nature of the discourse, is the resemblance stronger in the reports of it. ὡς αὐτῶν]

Mk. 4—8.] Mt. and Mk. agree nearly verbally. In ver. 7 Mk. adds καὶ καρπὸν οὐκ ἔδωκεν, and in ver. 8, ἀναβαίνοντα κ. αὐξανόμενον. On this latter, Meyer remarks, that the two present parts. are predicates of καρπὸν, which therefore must not be understood here of the fruit properly so called, the corns of wheat in the ears, but of the haulm, the first fruit of the successful seed. The corns first come in after ἔφερον.

οἱ μαθ. αὐτοῦ Lk. 11.] τὸ μυστήριον = τὰ μυστήρια Mt. and Lk. τοῖς ἑξω added here (= τοῖς λοιποῖς, Lk.) means the multitudes—those out of the circle of his followers. In the Epistles, all who are not Christians,—the corresponding meaning for those days,—are designated by it. τὰ πάντα γίνεσθαι, the whole matter is transacted. Herod. ix. 46, ἡμῖν οἱ λόγοι γιγνῶσθαι. 12.] We must keep the iva strictly to its telic meaning—in order that. When God transacts a matter, it is idle to say that the result is not the purpose. He doeth all things after the counsel of His own will. Mt., as usual, quotes a prophecy; Mk. hardly ever—except at the beginning of his Gospel: Lk., very seldom. ἀφ. αὐτ. = ἀφαιρῶμαι αὐτοῖς Mt., it should be forgiven them; i. e. 'forgiveness should be extended to them': no need to supply any thing, as the gloss of the rec. does: the expression is impersonal.

13—20.] EXPLANATION OF THE PA-

RABLE OF THE SOWER. In τὴν παρ. ταύτην, the general question which had been asked ver. 10 (τὰς παραβολὰς), is tacitly assumed to have had special reference to the one which has been given at length. Or we may understand, that the question of ver. 10 took the form which is given in || Mt.: διὰ τί ἐν παραβολαῖς λαλεῖς αὐτοῖς; in which case the τὰς must be generic: asked Him concerning parables; or His parables. The three explanations (see Mt. xiii. 18—23: Lk. viii. 9—15) are very nearly related to one another, with however differences enough to make the common hypotheses quite untenable. Mt. and Mk. agree nearly verbatim. Mt. however writing throughout in the singular (ὁ σαρεις κ.τ.λ.). Mk. has some additions, e. g. ὁ σπείρων τὸν λόγον σπ., ver. 14,—after ἡ ἀκ. τοῦ πλ., ver. 19. καὶ αἱ π. τὰ λ. ἐπιθ. — and some variations, e. g. σατανᾶς for Mt.'s ὁ πονηρὸς, and Lk.'s ὁ διάβ. Such matters are

26—29.] PARABLE OF THE SEED GROWING WE KNOW NOT HOW. Peculiar to Mk. By Commentators of the Straussian school it is strangely supposed to be the same as the parable of the tares, with the tares left out. If so, a wonderful and most instructive parable has arisen out of the fragments of the other, in which the idea is a totally different one.

 It is, the growth of the once-deposited seed by the combination of its own development with the genial power of the earth, all of course under the creative hand of God,—but independent of human care and anxiety during this time of growth. 26.] Observe ἄρα, without αὐτοῖς—implying that He is now proceeding with his teaching to the people:
 cf. ver. 33. ἄνθρωπος] some difficulty has been felt about the interpretation of this man, as to whether it is Christ or his ministers. The former certainly seems to be excluded by the καθ' αὐτόν, and ὅς οὐκ οἶδαν αὐτόν, ver. 27; and perhaps the latter by ἄρα, ver. 29. But I believe the parable to be one taken simply from human things,—the sower being quite in the background, and the whole stress being on the seed—its power and its development. The man then is just the farmer or husbandman, hardly admitting an interpretation, but necessary to the machinery of the parable. Observe, that in this case it is not τὸν σπόρον αὐτοῦ as in Lk. viii. 5,—and the agent is only hinted at in the most general way, e. g. ἀπεστ. τ. δρεκ., without a nom. case expressed. If a meaning must be assigned, the best is “human agency” in general. (It will be seen from this note, that I regard the exposition given in my first edition as a mistaken one.) βαλῶν, shall have cast—past tense, whereas καθεύδῃ and ἐγ. are present. The construction seems to be, The Kingdom of God is thus, that a man shall have cast, i. e. shall be as though he have cast: but it is not easy, and, as far as I know, unexpressed. It looks like a combination of ὡς ἀνθρ. βαλὼν, and ὡς ἰδν ἀνθρ. βάλῃ.

²⁷.] καθ. κ. ἐγ.—i. e. employs himself otherwise—goes about his ordinary occupations. The seed sown in the heart is in its growth dependent on other causes than mere human anxiety and watchfulness:—on a mysterious power implanted by God in the seed and the soil combined, the working of which is hidden from human eye. Beware of the mistake of Erasmus, who takes ὁ σπόρος as the subject of all the verbs in this verse.

²⁸.] No trouble of ours can accelerate the growth, or shorten the stages through which each seed must pass.

It is the mistake of modern Methodism, for instance, to be always working at the seed, taking it up to see whether it is growing, instead of leaving it to God's own good time, and meanwhile diligently doing God's work elsewhere: see Stier, iii. p. 12. Wesley, to favour his system, strangely explains καθεύδῃ καὶ ἐγ. νύκτ. κ. ἡμ. exactly contrary to the meaning of the parable—“that is, has it continually in his thoughts.”

εἰς σταχυας εἴτα] then (there is) full corn in the ear: if as D, then the corn (is) full in the ear.

²⁹.] παραδοῖ, offers itself: see reff., and Winer, Gr. Gr. § 38, 1. ἀποστέλλει, he puts in—i. e. the husbandman, see above. See Joel iii. 13, to which this verse is a reference:—also Rev. xiv. 14, 15, and 1 Pet. i. 23-25.

³⁰—34.] PARABLE OF THE GRAIN OF MUSTARD SEED. Mt. xiii. 31-35. Lk. xiii. 18, 19.

³⁰.] This Rabbinical method of questioning before beginning a discourse is also found in Lk., ver. 18,—without however the condescending plural, which embraces the disciples, in their work of preaching and teaching,—and indeed gives all teachers an example, to what the above supposition any thing which which supposes one of the daemones not to be mentioned by Mk. and Lk.: in other words, that the least circumstantial account is in possession of an additional particular which gives a new aspect to the whole: for the plural, used here and is there used of the two men, and their Lobeck's note. Before ἵνα understand πέριμι, or αἰρῶσι: or as Meyer suggests, connect it with the fact just announced:

 'this tidings I bring, in order that,' &c.
 To do this without any filling up, 'My daughter is, &c., in order that,' &c., is far-fetched, and savours too much of the sentimental. Or, it has been suggested that ἵνα might, by a mixture of constructions, depend on the foregoing παρακάλεσι.

 that she actually said it to some one—ἐν minute accuracy of one reporting what woman in her distress. 29.] On these

Justin Martyr, Dial. § 83, p. 186, says ταῦτα γὰρ τὰ τεκτονικά ἔργα ἐργάζετο ἐν ἀνθρώποις ὢν, ἀπορρα και ζυγα. Cf. the conflicting but apparently careless assertion of Orig. in the var. readd. The same voice, which could still the tempests, could any where and under any circumstances have commanded diseases to obey; but in most cases of human infirmity, it was our Lord's practice to require faith in the recipient of aid: and that being wanting, the help could not be given. However, from what follows, we find that in a few instances it did exist, and the help was given 12.] It is impossible to restrict the ὡς after ἐκήρυξαν entirely to the telic meaning, as Meyer, who is a purist on this point, attempts to do. There is certainly the mingling of the purport and the purpose, so often found in this participle after verbs implying declaration or request. See this treated of in note, 1 Cor. xiv. 13.

13.] ἔλαψεν ἑλαίῳ—this oil was not used medicinally, but as a vehicle of healing power committed to them;—a symbol of a deeper thing than the oil itself could accomplish. That such anointing has nothing in common with the extreme unction of Romanists, see proved in note on James v. 14. See for instances of such symbolic use of external applications, 15.] (He is) a prophet like one of the prophets;—i. e. in their meaning, 'He is not The Prophet for whom all are waiting, but only some prophet like those who have gone before.' Where did our Evangelist get this remarkable expression, in his supposed compilation from Mt. and Lk. ?

able attraction of construction, De Wette strangely observes, 'Mk. here combines the text of Lk. with that of Mt.' "ἐγὼ has the emphasis given by his guilty conscience." Meyer. The principal additional particulars in the following account of Jn.'s imprisonment and execution are,—ver. 19, that it was Herodias who persecuted John (on εἰκεῖν see ref. and note Lk. xi. 53), whereas Herod knew his worth and holiness, and listened to him with pleasure, and even complied in many things with his injunctions:—that the maiden went and asked counsel of her mother before making the request:—and that a σκευλάτωρ, one of the body-guard (see note on ver. 27 below), was sent to behead Jn. 18.] εἰλεγεν, more than once: it was the burden of John's exhortations to him. 20.] συνε-, preserved him; not, 'esteemed him highly?'—kept him in safety that he should not be killed by Herodias. The reading ἡπόρει is remarkable, and perhaps has some connexion with the διηπόρει of Luke ix. 7. The imperfects imply time, and habit. Whether Herod heard him only at such times as he happened to be at Machærus, or took him also to his residence at Tiberias, is, as Meyer remarks, uncertain. 21.] εὐκαί. not, a festal day, as Hammond and others interpret it, for this use of εὐκαίρος hardly seems to be justified—but, a convenient day (see ver. 31 and Acts xxiv. 25,—and cf. ³⁰⁻⁴⁴] FREDING OF THE FIVE THOU-SAND. Mt. xiv. 13-21. Lk. ix. 10-17.

Jn. vi. 1-13. This is one of the very few points of comparison between the four Gospels during the ministry of our Lord. And here again I believe Mk.'s report to be an original one, and of the very highest authority. Professor Bleek (Beiträge zur Evangelien-kritik, p. 200) believes that Mk. has used the Gospel of Jn.,—on account of the 200 denari in our ver. 37 and Jn. ver. 7;—and that he generally compiles his narrative from Mt.
and Lk. (ibid. p. 72-75), which has been

elsewhere shewed to be utterly untenable.
I believe Mk.'s to be an original full account; Mt.'s a compendium of this same account, but drawn up independently of Mk.'s:—Lk.'s a compendium of another account:—Jn.'s an independent narrative of his own as eye-witness.

³⁰] Mentioned by Lk., not by Mt. ³¹⁻³⁴]
One of the most affecting descriptions in the Gospels, and in this form peculiar to Mk. Mt. has a brief compendium of it. Every word and clause is full of the rich recollections of one who saw, and felt the whole. Are we mistaken in tracing the warm heart of him who said, 'I will go with thee to prison and to death?'

³¹] τῆς αὐτοῦ—not others; 'you alone.' ³³] πᾶσι, not 'α/ποῖ', but

αὐτῶν τὴν μεσόγειον οὐκίστοντες περὶ εἶποντο. 34.] ἐξελθὼν, having disembarked, most probably.
 Meyer would render it, 'having come forth from his solitude,' in Mt.,—and 'having disembarked' here: but I very much doubt the former. There is nothing in Mt. to imply that He had reached his place of solitude before the multitudes came up. John indeed, vv. 3—7, seems to imply this; but He may very well have mounted the hill or cliff from the sea before He saw the multitudes, and this would be on his disembarkation.
 To shew how arbitrary is the assumption of Mk. having combined Mt. and Lk.,— see how easily the same might be said of

Lk. himself, with regard to Mt. and Mk.
 here:—ἰθὺς ἀπὸ τοῦ ὄρους ἐβῆσθε αὐ-τῶν, Mt.:—ἤρξατο διδάσκειν αὐτ. πολ., Mk.:—ἐλάλει αὐτοῖς περὶ τ. βασι. τ. θ.,
 α. τοῦ χριστοῦ ἐκ θεαπειρίας ἰάρο, Lk :
 = Mt. + Mk. 35.] See notes on Jn. vi. 3—7, and Mt. xiv. 15—17. The Passover was near, which would account for the multitude being on the move.

37.] This verse is to me rather a decisive proof that (see above) Mk. had not seen Jn.'s account; for how could he, having done so, and with his love for accurate detail, have so generalized the particular account of Philip's question? That generalization was in the account which he used, and the circumstance was more ex-

 I prefer placing the interrogation at the end of the sentence, as simpler and less harsh than the arrangement of Lachm. (interrog. aft. αρτους, full stop at end) or Tischd. (comma, full stop). The two verbs will then be rendered must we go and buy, &c. . . ., and shall we (thus) give them to eat? 40.] πρᾶσαι (ref. Similarly Suidas, who adds καὶ πρᾶσιον λαχανον, viz. hore-hound: but the derivation is more probably from πρᾶσον, a leek. The word occurs in Hom. Od. η.

127, ἰνθα δὲ κοσμηταὶ πρᾶσαι παρὰ νεῖαν ὄρχον | παντοῖαι πιθέσιν, where the Schol., αἱ λαχαναῖαι ἢ αἱ τῶν φρυγῶν τετραγωνοὶ σχίσαι, ὡς τὰ πλινθία. The distributive repetitions of these words are Hebraisms: see ref., and note on ver. 7.

41.] κατέκλασεν and ἐμέρισεν, aorists, each express the one act by which He broke up the bread, and divided the fishes: ἐδίδου, imperf., that He gave the bread, διὰ ὅτι διὰ, to His disciples to distribute: with the fish there was no need of this bit by bit giving—one assignment sufficed. See Dr. Wordsw.'s note. The dividing of the fishes, and (ver. 43) the taking up fragments from the fishes, are both peculiar to and characteristic of Mk.:

—ὅπου . . . ἱεῖ does not signify merely ubi (as Grot. Wetst., &c.) by a Hebraism;
 there is in fact here no unusual construction at all: ὅπου stands by itself, and ἱεῖ ισθῖν is the matter introduced by the ὅτι recitantis.

56.] In *ὅπου ἄν εἰ-

 belongs not so much to the verbs, which are certain and definite, as to the indeindefinite, and spreading the assertion over every several occasion of the occur-

τουτέστιν ἀνίπ. is supposed by some to be a gloss, explaining

3. πυγμῇ] This word has perplexed all the Commentators. Of the various renderings which have been given of it, two are excluded by their not being grammatical—(1) that which makes it mean 'up to the elbow' (Euthym. and Thl.); 'including the hand as far as the wrist,' Lightf.: (2) 'having clenched the hand,' 'facto pugno' (Grot. and others).

The two meanings between which our choice lies are, (3) 'frequently' (as E. V.
 'oft,' and Vulg. 'crebro'), taking πυγμῇ = πυγνῇ = πυγνῶς, which however is not very probable: or (4), to which I most incline, and which Kuinoel gives, 'sedulo,'

It certainly refers to themselves; as it would not be any unusual practice to wash things bought in the market:—but probably not to washing their whole bodies: see below. ξιστ., not from ξίω, to polish, but a corruption of sextarius. See the passage of Josephus cited in the ref. χαλκ., brassen vessels; earthen ones, when unclean, were to be broken, Lev. xv. 12. These βαπτισμοί, as applied to κλινών (meaning probably here couches [triclinia] used at meals), were certainly not immersions, but sprinklings or affusions of water.  The ἀφιδροῦν is that which, by the re-

24—30.] THE SYROPHOENICIAN WO-MAN. Mt. xv. 21—23. Omitted by Lk.
A striking instance of the independence of the two narrations. Mk., who is much more copious in particulars, omits a considerable and important part of the history: this would be most arbitrarily and indeed inexcusably done, if the common account of his having combined and epitomized Mt. and Lk. is to be taken.

Our Lord's retirement was to avoid the Pharisees: see notes on Mt. throughout.

24.] Εκείθεν is not, from the land of Gennesaret (Meyer),—for ch. vi. 55, 56, has completely removed definiteness from the locality;—but refers to the (unspecified) place of the last discourse.
μεθόρια] The place must have been the neighbourhood of Tyre. The word is used in Xen. Cyr. i. 4. 16, εν τοις μεθοροις approaching that in our text: the repe-

A miracle which serves a most important purpose; that of clearly distinguishing between the cases of the possessed and the merely diseased or deformed. This man was what we call 'deaf and dumb;' the union of which maladies is often brought about by the inability of him who never has heard sounds to utter them plainly:—or, as here apparently, by some accompanying physical infirmity of the organs of speech. ³¹]

He went first northward (perhaps for the same reason, of privacy, as before) through Sidon, then crossed the Jordan, and so approached the lake on its E. side. On Decapolis, see Mt. iv. 25. We have the same journey related Mt. xv. 29; and κωφοὺς λαλοῦντας mentioned among the miracles, for which the people glorified the God of Israel.

Mt. ver. 38. 7.] We have a curious instance here of correction and confusion in the principal MSS. The ταῦτα in the text, arising from the graphic character of St. Mark's narrative [κ. ταῖ. παρατιθέναι = κ. ταῦ. παρατιθεῖν], gave offence to the transcribers. Hence the variety of corrections which will be found in the digest.

10.] Mt. mentions Magadan, ver. 39. Dalmanutha was probably a village in the neighbourhood,—see note on Mt., and the Land and the Book, p. 393;—a striking instance of the independence of Mk.: called by the Harmonists “an addition to St. Matthew's narrative, to shew his independent knowledge of the fact.” Wordsw. What very anomalous writers the Evangelists must have been.

ever the graphic and affecting ἀναστ. τῷ
πν. αὐ. ver. 12. 12.] εἰ δοθῇ, a Hebrew form of strong abjuration: see reff., and Winer, § 55 end.

14—21.] WARNING AGAINST THE LEAVEN OF THE PHARISEES AND OF HEROD. Mt. xvi. 5—12. Our account is fuller and more circumstantial,—relating that they had but one loaf in the ship,
ver. 14; inserting the additional reproofs,
ver. 18, and the reference to the two miracles of feeding more at length, vv. 19—21.
Mk. however omits the conclusion in Mt.,
—that they then understood that He spake to them of the doctrine, &c. Possibly this was a conclusion drawn in the mind of the narrator, not altogether identical with that to be drawn from our account here—for the leaven of Herod could not be doctrine (καὶ τ. ζ. Ἡρ., ver. 15—Mk. only),

but must be understood of the irreligious lives and fawning worldly practices of the hangers-on of the court of Herod.

14.] ἐπελ. is not pluperfect; see on Mt.
ver. 5. The subject to the verb is the disciples, unexpressed: see next verse.

15.] ὁρατε is merely take heed, and does not belong to ἀπε. βλέπ. ἀπε is not 'turn your eyes away from' (Tittm. and Kuin. in Meyer), but as in reff. The ζύμη Ἡρώδου here seems to answer to the
ζ. Σαδδουκαίων in Mt. But we must not infer from this that Herod was a Sadducee. He certainly was a bad and ir-religious man, which would be quite enough ground for such a caution. We have a specimen of the morals of his court in the history of John the Baptist's martyrdom. In the last οὐπω, ver. 21, Meyer sees a new climax, and refers the not yet to the moment even after the remembrance of vv. 18—20. It may doubtless be so, and the idea would well accord with the graphic precision of St. Mark.

22—26.] HEALING OF A BLIND MAN AT BETHSAIDA. Peculiar to Mk. This appears to have been Bethsaida Julias, on the N.E. side of the lake. Compare ver. 13: and see on this Bethsaida, Jos. Antt. xviii. 4. 6: B. J. iii. 10. 7: Plin. Nat. Hist. v. 15. Wieseler, Chron. Synops. p. 273 f. See however against the idea that there were two Bethsaiidas, The Land and the Book, pp. 373, f.

23.] The leading of this blind man out of the town appears as if it had been from some local reason. In ver. 26 we find him forbidden expressly to enter into or tell it in the town, and with a repetition of κώμη, which looks as if the place had been somehow unworthy of such a work being done there. (This is a serious objection against Meyer's reason, that the use of spittle on both occasions occasioned the same privacy here and in ch. vii. 33.) Or we may perhaps find the reason in our Lord's immediate departure to such a distance (ver. 27); and say, that He did not wish multitudes to gather about and follow Him.

We cannot say what may have induced our Lord to perform this miracle at twice—certainly not the reason assigned by Dr. Burton, "that a blind man would not, on suddenly recovering his sight, know one object from another, because he had never seen them before," and so would require a double miracle;—a second to open the eyes of his mind also, to comprehend what he saw. sumes the man to have been born blind, which he was not, from ver. 24; for how should he know how trees appeared? and besides, the case of the man born blind in John ix. required no such double healing. These things were in the Lord's power, and He ordered them as He pleased from present circumstances, or for our instruction. 24.] I see men, because I see them walking as it were trees; i. e. not distinct in individual peculiarity, but as trees in the hedge-row flit by the traveller. It is a minute mark of truth, that he describes the appearance of persons as he doubtless had often had occasion to do during the failing of sight which had ended in his blindness. By no possibility can the words convey, as Wordsw., three different stages of returning vision:

"I see men. I see them standing still, and dimly, as trees. I see them walking." For thus the εἶτα is altogether passed over, and περιπατοῦντας taken out of its government, and most unnaturally made into a sentence by itself. 25.] The distinction in the text here adopted, between διέβλεπεν and ἐνέβλεπεν, would be He saw clearly (the work of that instant), and was thoroughly restored, and (thenceforward) saw all things plainly. But the text is in much uncertainty. 26.] See above in this note,—and var. readd. The first and second μὴδὲ both carry a separate climax with them: he was not even to go into the village, no, nor so much as tell it to any who dwell in the village.

27—30.] CONFESSION OF PETER. Mt. xvi. 13—20. Lk. ix. 18—21. With the exception of the introduction in Lk., which describes the Lord to have been alone praying, and joined by his disciples,—and the omission of the praise of and promise to Peter by both Mk. and Lk., the three are in exact accordance. On this latter omission no stress must therefore be laid as to the character of Mark's Gospel, as has been done. (Thl. in l.—cited by De W.)

In vv. 34, 35, the agreement is close, except that Lk. adds καθ' ἡμέραν, aft. τὸν σ. αὐτοῦ, and Mk. καὶ τοῦ εὐαγγ. aft. ἰμοῦ, ver. 35 [it is perhaps worthy of remark that St. Mk. writes ἀκολουθεῖν in ver. 34: possibly from the information of him, to whom it was said, τι πρὸς σι; σύ μοι ἀκολουθεῖ, John xxi. 22]; and informs us, in ver. 34, that our Lord said these words, having called the multitude with his disciples. This Meyer calls a contradiction to Mt. and Lk.,—and thinks it arose from a misunderstanding of Lk.'s πάντας. Far rather should I say that our account represents every detail to the life, and that the πρός πάντας contains traces of it. What wonder that a crowd should here, as every where else, have collected about Him and the disciples? 37.] If (see var. readd.) the words in brackets be omitted, the sense will be, For what can be an equivalent for his life! 38.] Mk. and Lk.

2—13.] THE TRANSFIGURATION. Mt.
 VOL. I.

xvii. 1—13. Lk. ix. 28—36. Here again, while Mt. and Mk.'s accounts seem to have one and the same source, they have deflected from it, and additional particulars have found their way into our text.
 Lk.'s account is from a different source.
 If we might conjecture, Peter has furnished the accounts in Mt. and Mk.:— this latter being retouched,—perhaps by himself: while that of Lk. may have had another origin. The additional particulars in our text are,—the very graphic and noble description in ver. 3, ἐν ὧδε . . .

answer. But not to mention that such a sentence would be without example in our Lord's discourses, the sense given by it is meagre in the extreme. As it stands in the text, it forms a counter-question to that of the Apostles in ver. 11. They asked, How say the Scribes that Elias must first come? Our Lord answers it by telling them that it is even so; and returns the question by another: And how is it (also) written of the Son of Man, that He, &c.? then comes the conclusion in ver. 13 with ἀλλὰ λέγω ὑμῖν, stating that Elias has come, and leaving it therefore to be inferred that the sufferings of the Son of Man were close at hand. Notice how the γιγρ. ἐπ' αὐτόν binds both together. Just as the first coming of the Son of Man is to suffer and to die, so has the first coming of Elias been as it was written of him; but there is a future coming of Elias ἀποκαθιστάνει πάντα, and of the Son of Man in glory. See further in notes on Mt. The first καὶ in ver. 13 is also, binding what is said of Elias to that which has been said of the Son of man: the second καὶ is simply and.

14—20.] HEALING OF A POSSESSED

LUNATIC. Mt. xvii. 14—21. Lk. ix. 37—42. The account of Mk. is by far the most copious: and here, which is very rarely the case in the official life of our Lord, the three accounts appear to have been originally different and independent. The descent from the mountain was on the day following the transfiguration, Lk. ver. 37. 14.] The Scribes were probably boasting over the disciples, and reasoning from their inability to that of their Master also. As Stier remarks, there is hardly such another contrast to be found in the Gospel as this, between the open heaven and the sons of glory on the mount, and the valley of tears with its terrible forms of misery and pain and unbelief. I have already in the notes to Mt. spoken of the noble use made of this contrast in the last and grandest picture of the great-est of painters—the Transfiguration of Raffaele. 15.] The Lord's countenance probably retained traces of the glory on the mount; so strong a word as ἐξεθαμβήθησαν would hardly have been used merely of their surprise at His sudden approach; see Exod. xxiv. 29, 30. That brightness, however, terrified the people: this attracts them: see 2 Cor. iii. 7—18.

 spirit of longing to be gone from them,
 but of holy impatience of their hardness disciples, Scribes, and multitude are equally involved. 20.] ἰδὼν is out of strict concord with πνεῦμα, but has regard to has great wrath, when his time is short."

bring in the trial of his faith. 23.] See Mt. ver. 15. εἰ τι δύνῃ] This bespeaks, if any faith, at most but a very ignorant and weak one. ἡμᾶς—the wretched father counts his child's misery
 his own: thus the Syrophenician woman, Mt. xv. 25, βοήθει μοι. 23.] In τὸ εἰ δύνῃ, the τὸ involves the sense in some difficulty. The most probable rendering is to make it designatory of the whole sentence, Jesus said to him the saying, "If thou canst believe, all things are," &c.: a saying which doubtless He often uttered on similar occasions. Kuinoel quotes a similar construction from Polyæmus, iii. 9. 11, Ἱεράρχης ὑπολαβὼν εἶπεν τὸ τίς ἂν ἡλπίσει τοῦτο ἵστασθαι. Some
 (e. g. Tischd.) omitting the πιστεύσαι would set an interrogation after δύνῃ, and suppose our Lord to be citing the father's words: "didst thou say, 'if thou canst?'—all things are," &c. Others, as Dr. Burton, suppose it to mean τὸ εἰ δύνῃ πιστεῦσαι (imperative):—"Believe what you have expressed by your εἰ τι δύνῃ, &c." But both these renderings involve methods of construction and expression not usual in the Gospels. The εἰ δύνῃ is a manifest reference to the εἰ

τι δύνῃ before, and meant to convey a reproof, as the father's answer testifies.
 The sentence, also, unless I am mistaken, is meant to convey an intimation that the healing was not to be an answer to the εἰ τι δύνῃ, so that the Lord's power was to be challenged and proved,—but an answer to faith, which (of course by laying hold on Him who πάντα δύναται) can do all things. 24.] Nothing can be more touching and living than this whole most masterly and wonderful narrative. The poor father is drawn out into a sense of the unworthiness of his distrust, and "the little spark of faith which is kindled in his soul reveals to him the abyssal depths of unbelief which are there." (Trench,
 p. 367.) "Thus," remarks Olshausen (B.
 Comm. i. 584), "does the Redeemer shew himself to the father as a μακρῆς πίστεως first, before He heals his son. In the struggle of his anxiety, the strength of Faith is born, by the aid of Christ, in the soul empty of it before." There is strong analogy in the Lord's treatment of the father here, for the sponsorial engagement in infant baptism. The child is by its infirmity incapacitated; it is therefore the father's faith which is tested, and when that is proved, the child is healed. The fact is, that the analogy rests far deeper: viz. on the 'inclusion' of 'the old man' in Adam and the 'new man' in Christ; see Rom. v. 12—21. It may be well to remind the reader that there is nothing "more pathetic and expressive" (Wordsw.) in μου τῷ ἀπιστίᾳ than in τ. ἀπ. μου: see on Matt. xvi. 18.

25.] This took place at a distance from the crowd, among those who had run forward to meet our Lord, ver. 15.
 ἐν τῷ πν. σελ.] The personal pronoun is emphatic, as opposed to the want of power on the part of the disciples. This is the only place where we have such a charge as μηκέτι εἰσελθ. εἰς αὐτόν.—shewing the excessive malignity and tenacity of this kind (see ver. 29) of spirit. This is also shewn by ver. 26.

27.] See ch.
 v. 41; also Mt. xvii. 6, 8: Rev. i. 17:
 Dan. x. 9, 10.

29.] The answer is given more at length in Mt. ver. 20, and the Lord there distinctly includes the disciples in the γενεά ἀπιστος, by telling them διὰ τὴν ἀπιστίαν ὑμῶν. The assurance also occurs there, which was repeated Mt. xxi. 21, where see notes.

τοῦτο τὸ γένος.] That there are kinds, more and less malicious, of evil spirits, we find from Mt. xii. 45—and the pertinacity and cruelty of this one shewed him to belong to the worst kind. The Lord's saying here is rather for their after guidance, than their present; for they could not fast while He was with them, ch. ii.

30—33.] SECOND ANNOUNCEMENT OF HIS DEATH AND RESURRECTION. Mt. xvii. 23, 23. Lk. ix. 43—45, where see notes, as this account is included in the two others.

33—50.] DISCOURSE RESPECTING THE GREATEST AMONG THEM. Mt. xviii. 1—9. Lk. ix. 46—50. Here again the three accounts are independent, and differ in some particulars unimportant in themselves, but very instructive for a right comparison of the three Gospels. First take Lk.'s account.—The disciples had been disputing;—our Lord knowing the strife of their hearts, took a child, &c.:—then compare Mk.—our Lord asked them, on coming into a house, what had been the subject of their dispute;—they were silent from shame;—He sat down, delivered his sentence to the twelve,—and then took the child, &c.—Lastly turn to

Mt. There, the disciples themselves referred the question to our Lord, and He took the child, &c. Who can forbear seeing in these narratives the unfettered and independent testimony of three witnesses, consistent with one another in the highest form and spirit of truthfulness, but differing in the mere letter? Mk.'s account is again the richest and fullest, and we can hardly doubt that if the literal exact detail of fact is in question, we have it here. 33.] Between the coming to Capernaum, and this discourse, happened the demand of the tribute money, Mt. xvii. 20—27.

34.] There is no real difference in the matter in question here (and in Lk.), and in Mt. The kingdom of heaven was looked on as about soon to appear: and their relative rank now would be assumed as their relative rank then. The difference in the expres-

36.] See Mt. xx. 26, and note. 38. ἀναγ. ἀνέ.] This particular we learn from Mk.

37.] See

Mt. x. 40. 38.] Only found besides in Lk., vv. 49, 50.

Notice the repetition of εὖκ ἀπολ. ἡμ. as characteristic of Mk. The connexion of this remark with what goes before, is: 'If the receiving any one, even a little child, in thy Name, be receiving Thee; were we doing right when we forbade one who used thy Name, but did not follow us?' 'Observe hoc," says Bengel, "qui charismata alligant successioni canonica." This man actually did what the very Apostles themselves were specially appointed to do: and our Lord, so far from prohibiting, encourages him; see Numb. xi. 26—29.

39.] See 1 Cor. xii. 3. The very success of the miracle will awe him, and prevent him from soon or lightly speaking evil of me. We must beware of supposing that the application of this saying is to be confined to the working of a miracle—ver. 40 shews that it is general—a weighty maxim of Christian toleration and charity, and caution to men how they presume to limit the work of the Spirit of God to any sect, or succession, or outward form of Church: cf. Phil. i. 16—18. See the way in which the nearly opposite inference is extracted from the words, in the very curious note of Dr. Wordsw. here.

40.] This saying is not inconsistent with that in Mt. xii. 30. They do not refer to the same thing. This is said of outward conformity—that, of inward unity of purpose—two widely differing things. On that saying, see note there. On this, we may say—all those who, notwithstanding outward differences of communion and government, believe in and preach Jesus Christ, without bitterly and uncharitably opposing each other, are hereby declared to be helpers forward of each other's work. O that all Christians would remember this! Stier (Red. J. iii. 24) strongly deprecates the reading ἡμῶν—ἡμῶν; "The us in the mouth of our Lord here confuses and destroys nearly the Still, there is a propriety, a tempering the rebuke with a gracious reminiscence of their unity with Him, and something exceedingly suiting the χριστοῦ ἰστί below, in ἡμῶν—ὑμῶν. In the divided state of the critical evidence, the reading must be ever doubtful.

41.] This verse does not take up the discourse from ver. 37, as some tions by this or that Evangelist, but as the truth of what was uttered by our Lord; see Prolegomena. Vv. 44, 46, 48 are only in Mk.; they are cited from Isaiah (see ref.), where the prophecy is of the carcasses of those who have transgressed against the Lord. This triple repetition gives sublimity, and leaves no doubt of the discourse having been verbatim thus uttered. See note on Mt. v. 23.

49.] In order to understand this difficult verse, it will be necessary first to examine its connexion and composition. (1) What is γάρ? It connects it with the solemn assertions in vv. 43—48, καλόν ἐστίν σε . . . and furnishes a reason why it is better for us to cut off and cast away, &c. πᾶς then is every one, absolutely: referring back both to the σε, and the αὐτῶν above—πᾶσα θυσία is (not opposed to [Meyer], but) parallel with πᾶς, and καὶ equivalent to just as. (2) This being stated, let us now enquire into the symbolic terms used. FIRE, is the refiner's fire of Mal. iii. 2, to which indeed there seems to be a reference; the fire of Mt. iii. 11 and Acts ii. 3; of Ezech. xxviii. 14 (see my Hulsean Lectures for 1841, pp. 9—12). Fire is the symbol of the divine purity and presence:—our God is a consuming fire, not only to his foes, but to his people: but in them, the fire shall only burn up what is impure and requires purifying out, 1 Cor. iii. 13: 1 Pet. i. 7; iv. 12, 17. This very fire shall be to them as a preserving salt. The SALT of the covenant of God (Lev. ii. 13) was to be mixed with every sacrifice; and it is with fire that all men are to be salted. This fire is the divine purity and judgment in the covenant, whose promise is, 'I will dwell among them.' And in and among this purifying fire shall the people of God ever walk and rejoice everlastingly. Rev. xxi. 23. This is the right understanding of Isa. xxxiii. 14, 15, 'Who among us shall dwell with the devouring fire? &c. He that walketh in righteousness,' &c. And thus the connexion with the preceding verses is,—'it is better for thee to cut off,' &c.—'for it is part of the salting of thee, the living sacrifice (Rom.

Mt. in preserving the order and connexion of the discourses.

12.] This verse corresponds to ὁ ἀπολυμίνην γαμήσας μοιχᾶται in Mt. ver. 9—but it is expressed as if the woman were the active party, and put away her husband, which was allowed by Greek and Roman law (see 1 Cor. vii. 13), but not by Jewish (see Deut. xxiv. 1: Jos. Antt. xv. 7. 10). This alteration in the verbal expression may have originated in the source whence Mark's report was drawn. On μοιχᾶται, Grotius remarks, 'Mulier, cum domina sui non sit, si, marito relicto, ad aliud matrimonium se conferat, omnino adulterium committit, non interpretatione aliqua, aut per consequentiam, sed directe: ideo non debuit hic addi, ἐκ' αὐτήν.'

13-16.] THE BRINGING OF CHILDREN TO JESUS. Mt. xix. 13-15. Lk. xviii. 15-17. The three are nearly identical:—from Mt. we have the additional reason και προσεύχεται, and from Mk., ἵναγκαλίστα. 13. παιδια] Not only children, but as in Lk., infants (βρίφη): and our Lord was not to teach them, but only to touch, and pray over them. This simple, seemingly superstitious application of ὁ προσφέρωντες (perhaps not the mothers only) the disciples, interrupted in their converse on high and important subjects, despise and reprove.

14.] We can hardly read our Lord's solemn saying, without seeing that it reaches further than the mere then present occasion. It might one day become a question whether the new Christian covenant of repentance and faith could take in the unconscious infant, as the old covenant did:—whether when Jesus was no longer on earth, little children might be brought to Him, dedicated to his service, and made partakers of his blessing? Nay, in the pride of the human intellect, this question was sure one day to be raised: and our Lord furnishes the Church, by anticipation, with an answer to it for all ages. Not only may the little infants be brought to Him,—but in order for us who are mature to come to Him, we must cast away all that wherein our maturity has caused us to differ from them, and become LIKE THEM. Not only is Infant Baptism justified, but it is (abstractedly considered;— not as to preparation for it, which from the nature of the case is precluded) the NORMAL PATTERN OF ALL BAPTISM; none can enter God's kingdom, except as an infant. In adult baptism, the exceptional case (see above), we strive to secure that state of simplicity and childlikeness, which in the infant we have ready and undoubted to our hands. 16.] κατενδύει, like all such compounds, is more forcible and complete than the simple verb would have been. It may be rendered He fervently blessed them.

17—31.] ANSWER TO AN ENQUIRER RESPECTING ETERNAL LIFE, AND DISCOURSE THEREUPON. Mt. xix. 16—30. Lk. xviii. 18—30. On the different form of our Lord's answer in Mt., see notes there. As it here stands, so far from giving any countenance to Socinian error, it is a pointed rebuke of the very view of Christ which they who deny His Divinity entertain. He was no 'good Master,' to be singled out from men on account of His pre-eminence over his kind in virtue and wisdom: God sent us no such Christ as this, nor may any of the sons of men be thus called good. He was one with Him who only is good, the Son of the Father, come not to teach us merely, but to beget us anew by the divine power which dwells in Him. The low view then, which this applicant takes of Him and his office, He at once rebukes and annuls, as He had done before in the case of Nicodemus: see Jn. iii. 1 ff. and notes.

The dilemma, as regards the Socinians, has been well put (see Stier ii. 283, note): —either, "There is none good, but God: Christ is good: therefore Christ is God;" —or, "There is none good, but God: Christ is not God: therefore Christ is not good."

With regard to other points, the variations in the narratives are trifling, but instructive—εἰ δὲ θεός. εἰς τ. ζ. εἰς. τῆς. τ. ἰστ. λέγει αὐτῷ. Ποίᾳ; ὁ δὲ Ἰησ. εἶπεν τό. (Mt.) = τὰς ἐντολάς οἶδας (Mk. and Lk.) without any break in the discourse. Similarly, in Matt., the young (Mt.) ruler (Lk.) asks, ver. 20, τί ἐστὶν ὑπερβᾶ; but in Mk. and Lk., Jesus says to him (and here with the remarkable addition of ἐμῶν. αὐτ. ἡγ. αὐτ.), ἐν σοὶ ὑπερβαί (or σοὶ λέγει). Such notices as these shew the point at which, not short of which nor beyond which, we may expect the Evangelists to be in accord; viz. in that inner truthfulness of faithful report which reflects to us the teaching of the Lord, but does not depend on slavish literal exactitude; which latter if we require, we overthrow their testimony, and most effectually do the work of our adversaries.

17.] εἰς ὁδόν, out of the house, ver. 10, to continue His journey, ver. 32. The running and the kneeling are both found in the graphic St. Mark only.

19.] Mk. here takes exactly the commandments of the second table,—μὴ ἀποστ. standing for the tenth. Mt. adds their summary (ἀγαπ. τ. πλησιον σου ὡς σεαυτ.), omitting (with Lk.) μὴ ἀποστ. perhaps on account of μὴ ελ. having gone before. ²¹.] Notice the graphic details again, of looking on him and loving him. ἄρας τὸν στ. is added here. ²².] ἦν γὰρ ἔχων—so also Mt. ²³—³¹.] Here our ver. 24 is a most important addition; the rest is much alike in the three. In that verse we have all misunderstanding of our Lord's saying removed, and "the proverb," as Wesley well observes (Stier ii. p. 290),

"shifted to this ground: 'It is easier for a camel, &c. than for a rich man to cast off his trust in his riches.'" Yet the power of divine grace can and does accomplish even this. ²⁴.] τέκνα is remarkable and a trace of exactitude: see Jn. xxi. 5:—so also παρὰ. ver. 23.

²⁵.] This reiterated expression of dismay, after the explanation in ver. 24, need not surprise us. The disciples were quite as well aware as we should be, if we deal truly with ourselves, that οι τα χρηματα ιχοντες and οι πειποθετες επι χυμωσιν are too nearly commensurate, to relieve the mind of much of its dread at the solemn saying which preceded. Of the καὶ at the beginning of a question, Kühner remarks, on Xen. Mem. p. 117 (in Meyer) "cum vi auctiva ita ponitur, ut is qui interrogat cum admiratione quadam alterius orationem excipere, ex eaque conclusionem ducere significetur qua alterius sententia confutetur." 28.] Here is an instance of a saying of Peter's reported, without any distinction indicating that he had a share in the report. See notes on Mt. for the promise here made to the Apostles. 29, 30.] Here our report is most important. To it and Lk. we owe νυν ἐν τῷ καιρῷ τούτῳ, without which the promise might be understood of a future life only :—and to it alone we owe the particularising of the returns made, and the words μετὰ διωγμῶν, which light up the whole passage, and shew that it is the inheritance of the earth in the higher sense by the meek which is spoken of;—see 1 Cor. iii. 21, 22. Observe mothers—nature gives us only one—but love, many (see Rom. xvi. 13). We do not read, failors, perhaps because of our high and absorbing relation to our Father in heaven, cf. Mt. xxiii. 9. On καὶ τοῦ εὐαγγελίου, Dr. Wordsw. observes, "See above, viii. 36, where this phrase (not found in the other Evangelists, see Matt. xvi. 25: Luke ix. 24) is inserted by St. Mark. Perhaps it made a greater impression upon his mind, because he had formerly shrunk from suffering ἵνα εὐαγγελίου. (See Acts xiii. 13; xv. 36.) St. Mark also alone here inserts our Lord's words, μετὰ διωγμῶν, perhaps from a recollection that he had been once affrighted by persecution from doing the work of [The remarkable particulars of ver. 32 are only found here.] This was (see Mt. xvi. 21; xvii. 22) the third declaration of His sufferings which the Lord had made to the disciples, and it was His going before them, accompanied most probably by something remarkable in his gait and manner—a boldness and determination perhaps, an eagerness, denoted in Lk. xii. 50, which struck them with astonishment and fear.

The ἀρας τὸν στ., so often alluded to, might have had now for them a deep meaning—but see Lk. ver. 34. After τοις ἔθν. the subject of the verbs (ἐμπτ., μαστ. &c.) is τὰ ἔθνη.

3. δ κύρ. . . . ἄς] The pres. ἀποστέλλει, is used of future things whose occurrence is doubted; see Mt. xvii. 11; xi. 3 al.: but the words are somewhat ambiguous. From the ancient interpolation of πάντες, it seems that they were understood all to belong to δ κύριος — the Lord hath need of it, and will immediately send it [back]. Lechm., by printing the words without a stop, evidently adopts this rendering: and Origen, tom. xvi. in Matt. § 16, p. 741, favours it. But verisimilitude seems to me to be against it: and the final clause in ver. 6, καὶ ἀφῆκαν αὐτοῖς, appears to correspond with this. So that I would understand it as in E. V.: and straightway he (the speaker or owner) will send it hither. 4.] The report of one of those sent: qu. Peter? ἀμφοῖς. (a road leading round a place) is probably the street; see reff. Wordsw. interprets it, 'the back way, which led round the house.' But there does not appear to be any reason for supposing the ἀμφοῖς to refer to the house, rather than to the whole block, or neighbourhood, of houses, round about which the street led.

8, 9.] On the interesting addition in Lk. vv. 37—40, see notes there. ¹⁰ στιβ. = βολα τ. φοινίκων Jn. ver. 13: but this word, by its derivation from στειβω, signifies not merely branches, but branches cut for the purpose of being littered to walk on: and thus implies ἱστρώννυσον εἰς τὴν ὁδόν, which has been unskilfully supplied. Dr. Wordsworth complains of the introduction of τῶν ἄγρων into the text, adding "other instances, unhappily far too numerous, might be cited, where corrupt glosses and barbarisms have been recently received as improvements into the Sacred Text." Surely a Commentator of Dr. W.'s learning and piety should know better than to write thus. He well knows, that it is not as improvements, that any such changes have been introduced as those to which he alludes, but simply and humbly in deference to the carefully weighed evidence of the best and oldest authorities, combined with that furnished by the existing phenomena of interpolation and adaptation of parallel places. The charge of attempting to "improve the Sacred Text" recoils on those, who in the face of such evidence, with such questions as "What writer would say, they cut branches off the fields?", shelter their own rationalizing subjectivities under received readings which have been themselves glosses and "improvements" on the Sacred Text. ¹⁰] εὐλ. . . . 11.] See Mt. ver. 12, and notes on ver. 1: also on Jn. ii. 13—18. I am by no means certain that the solution proposed in the notes on Mt. is the right one, but I cannot suggest a better. When Mk., as here, relates an occurrence throughout, with such signs of an eyewitness as in ver. 4, it is very difficult to suppose that he has transposed any

12—26.] THE BARREN FIG-TREE. THE CLEANSING OF THE TEMPLE. Mt. xxi. 12—22. Our account here bears strong marks of being that of a beholder and hearer: e. g. ἐξελθ. αὐ. ἀπὸ Βηθ.—μακρόθεν.—ἔχουσιν φύλλα.—καὶ ἤκουον οἱ μαθ. αὐτ. The times and order of the events are here more exact than in Mt., who places the withering of the tree immediately after the word spoken by our Lord.

13.] et ἄρα, si forte, si, rebus ita comparatis; see Klotz, ad Devar. ii. p. 178. ὁ γὰρ κ. οὐκ ἦν σ.] The ellipsis may be supplied,—for the season was not (one) of figs,—or, for the season was not (that) of figs, i. e. not yet the season for figs. The latter suits the context best. The tree was precocious, in being clothed with leaves: and if it had had on it winter figs, which remain on from the autumn, and ripen early the next season, they would have been ripe at this time. But there were none—it was a barren tree. On the import of this miracle, see notes on Mt. 15—19.] Mt. xxi. 12, 13, where see notes: also Lk. xix. 45—48. 18. οὐκ ᾤφειεν ἵνα] “Observe, ἵνα et ὅρα a recentioribus poetis frequentari post v.rba jubendi.” Herm. ad Viger., p. 849. phcy:—‘mentioned by Mk. as writing for Gentile Christians’—Meyer, but qu.?

18. πᾶς ὁ ὄχλος. . .] This remark, given by Mk. and Lk., is omitted by Mt.: probably because he has given us so much of the διδασχὴ itself.

19.] See note on
 Mt. ver. 17. On the Monday and Tuesday evenings, our Lord appears to have gone to Bethany.

20—26.] The answers are very similar to those in Mt., but with one important addition here, viz. vv. 25, 26: see Mt. vi. 14, and 1 Tim. ii. 8. The connexion here seems to be, ‘Though you should aim at strength of faith,—yet your faith should not work in all respects as you have seen me do, in judicial anger condemning the unfruitful and evil; but you must forgive.’

24.] ελάβετε is aor., because the reception spoken of is the determination in the divine counsels coincident with the request—believe that when you asked, you received, and the fulfilment shall come, ἔσται.

25.] On the matter cf. Mt. vi. 14 f. See also

ib. v. 23 f., where the converse to this is treated of.

In ὅταν στήκετε, the ἔν connects, not with the verb, but with the στε, giving indefiniteness to the occasion, not to the act. See Klotz. Devar. p. 470, 475. He gives an example from Lycurgus contr. Leocratem, p. 162 (§ 107), ὅταν ἐν τοῖς ὅπλοις ἐστρατεύομενοι εἰσὶ.

26.] In εἰ . . . οὐκ, the negative must be closely joined to the verb; the verb, not the conditional particle, carrying the negative: q. d. ‘if ye refuse to forgive.’

27—33.] THE AUTHORITY OF JESUS
 QUESTIONED. HIS REPLY. Mt. xxi. 23—32. Lk. ix. 1—8. Our account and that of Mt. are very close in agreement. Lk.’s has (cf. ver. 6, ὁ λ. ἄπας κατ. ἡμ.) few and unimportant additions: see notes on Mt.

28.] ταῦτα need not necessarily refer to the cleansing of the temple, as Meyer; but seems from || Lk., to extend over our Lord’s whole course of teaching and putting himself forward in public.

CHAP. XII. 1—12.] PARABLE OF THE

VINEYARD LET OUT TO HUSBANDMEN.
This parable is, for the most part, identical with that in Mt. xxi. 33—46, and Lk. xx.
9—19. The number, and treatment of the servants sent, is enlarged on here;—and in ver. 4 there occurs the singular word κεφαλαιῶν, which appears to be used by a solecism for κεφαλίζω, 'to wound in the head.' Some have rendered it, 'they made short work with him,' which is the more usual sense of the word, but not probable here; for they did not kill him, but dis-

9.] ἐλεύσεται, &c., is not the answer of the Pharisees, or of the people, as the corresponding sentence in || Mt. (see note there), but, here and in || Lk., a continuation of our Lord's discourse. After ver. 11 comes in Mt.

vv. 43—45. 12.] Meyer makes δ ὄχλος (and δ λαός in || Lk.) the subject to ἔγνωσαν, but I think quite unnecessarily. The fear of the people is increased by the consciousness on the part of the rulers that He had spoken the parable against them: they are as men convicted before the people.

13—17.] REPLY CONCERNING THE LAWFULNESS OF TRIBUTE TO CÆSAR. Mt. xlii. 15—22. Lk. xx. 20—26. The parable of the wedding-garment, Mt. xxii. 1—14, is omitted. The only matters requiring additional remark in these verses are,—13.] Λόγῳ is the instrument whereby they would ἀγρεύειν: the verb being one taken from the chase. They wished to lay hold on him by some saying of His.

14.] ἐπ' ἀληθ., truly,—indeed,—see reff. and ver. 32. δῶμεν ἢ μὴ δ.; the originality of the report is shewn by these words. They wish to drive our Lord to an absolute affirmation or negation.

^{28—34.} REPLY CONCERNING THE GREAT COMMANDMENT. Mt. xxii. 34—40, but with differing circumstances. There the question appears as that of one among the Pharisees' adherents, who puts this question, ποιῶν αὐτόν,—and in consequence of the Pharisees coming up to the strife, after He had discomfited the Sadducees. I should be disposed to take Mk's as the strictly accurate account, seeing that there is nothing in the question which indicates enmity, and our Lord's answer, ver. 34, plainly precludes it. who gathered together for the purpose of tempting Him. Mk.'s report, which here is wholly unconnected in origin with Mt.'s, is that of some one who had taken accurate note of the circumstances and character of the man: Mt.'s is more general, not entering, as this, into individual motives, but classing the question broadly among the various "temptations" of our Lord at this time.

28.] The motive, as shewn by the subordination of ἀκούσας to προσελθών, and of εἰδὼς to ἐπηρώτησεν, seems to have been, admiration of our Lord's wise answer, and a desire to be instructed further by Him. εἰνρ. πρώτη πάντ. ;—this was one of the μάχαι νομικαὶ (Tit. iii. 9),—which was the greatest commandment. The Scribes had many frivolous enumerations and classifications of the commands of the law.

πάντων, not πασών: πρώτη-πάντων is treated almost as one word, so that πάντων does not belong to εἰνρ. understood, but, q. d. 'first-of-all of the commandments.'

29 f.] Mk. cites the passage entire,—Mt.

only the command itself:—compare the LXX. In this citation the Vat. reading διανοίας and the Alex. καρδίας are combined: and ἰσχύος = δυνάμεις. "Thou shalt love the Lord with spirit, soul, and body:" with the inner spirit, and the outer life. This is faith working by love: for ε. ὁ θ. ἡμῶν is the language of faith.

30.] ἰσχύς is the inner spiritual strength of the heart: see Beck's useful little manual, Die biblische Seelenlehre, p. 110.

31.] Our Lord adds this second, as an application or bringing home of the first.

The first is the Sun, so to speak, of the spiritual life:—this the lesser light, which reflects the shining of that other. It is like to it, inasmuch as both are loves of love: both deduced from the great and highest love: both dependent on 'I am the Lord thy God,' Lev. xix. 18.

Stier sets forth beautifully the strong contrast between the requirements of these two commands, and the then state of the Jewish Church: see Jn. vii. 19.

32, 33.] The Scribe shews that he had entered into the true spirit of our Lord's answer; and replies in admiration at its wisdom. This man had hold of that principle in which Law and Gospel are one: he stood as it were at the door of the Kingdom of God. He only wanted (but the want was indeed a serious one) repentance and faith to be within it. The Lord shews us here that even outside His flock, those who can answer νουνεχῶς—who have knowledge of the spirit of the great command of Law and Gospel, are nearer to being of his flock, than the formalists:—but then, as Bengel adds, 'Si non procul es, intra: alias praestiterit, procul fuisse.' καὶ οὐδεὶς . . .] This is apparently out of its place here, as it is after the question which now follows, that Mt. relates this discomfiture of his adversaries. We must not however conclude too hastily, especially where the minute accuracy of Mk. is at stake. The question just asked was the last put to our Lord, and therefore the notice of its being the last comes in fitly here. The enquiry which follows did more than silence their questioning: it silenced their answering too; both which things Mt. combines as the result of this day, in his ver. 46. ἐπερωτήσας] not, 'to ask him any more questions': see on ch. xi. 29.

33—40.] DENUNCIATION OF THE SCRIBES. Luke xx. 45—47. These verses, nearly verbatim the same in the two Evangelists, and derived from a common report, are an abridgment of the discourse which occupies the greater part of Mt. xxiii.—with the additions of θελ. ἐν στολ. περιπ., and οἱ κατέσθ. . . . κρίμα (see § Mt., text, and var. read.). The words ἐν τῇ δειπ. αὐτ. seem to imply that

Mk. understood it as a compendium.

ἀσπασμοὺς and the following accusatives are governed by θελόντων.

οἱ κατέσθοντες may either be dependent on the preceding by a broken construction, or may be the beginning of a new sentence of exclamation, as Meyer takes it. The former is to me the more probable, and I have punctuated accordingly. It is a change of construction not without example in the classics: Herod. i. 51, λαεδαμονίων φαμένων εἶναι ἀνάθεμα, οὐκ ὀρθῶς λήγοντες. See also ref. The art. points them out graphically. They devoted widows' houses, by attaching them to themselves, and so persuading them to minister to them of their substance. A trace of this practice (but there out of gratitude and love) on the part of the Jewish women, is found in Lk. viii. 2, 3. What words can better describe the corrupt practices of the so-called priesthood of Rome, than these of D D

8.] ἔσονται . . . ἔσονται. By these repetitions majesty is given to the discourse.

9.] ἀρχαί is put forward for emphasis—the mere beginnings. ὑμῖς likewise has the emphasis—let your care be . . . εἰς συνάγ., a pregnant construction—'ye shall be taken into the synagogues and beaten there.' So also in ver. 16. Dr. Wordsw. explains the εἰς, "Ye will be exposed before the eyes of congregations in synagogues, for their pleasure:" and ἐν συν. would mean, "in the buildings, without any reference to the people in them." But how will this apply to ὁ εἰς τὸν ἀγρόν ὢν, ver. 16? Meyer, with Lachmann al., would punctuate after συναγωγὰς, and take δαρήσεσθε by itself. This is most improbable, especially when we remember that the syna- gogues were the places where the scourging was inflicted (see Acts xxii. 19), not to mention the objection to taking the verb thus by itself, which seems to me (against Meyer) alien from the character of the discourse. 11.] Mk. has vv. 10, 11 peculiar to himself. Lk. (vv. 14, 15) has something very like them—Mt. nothing: but they occur Mt. x. 19, where see note.

Meyer remarks that μελετᾶτε is the regular technical word for premeditating a discourse—in contrast to extempore speaking. Observe the emphasis on ἐστε—it is not you at all, but another.

much rather should you in these sure and awful signs discern the approach of the end. 30.] η γενεα αὕτη—see on Mt. ver. 34. Meyer, who is strongly for the literal and exact γενεα, states in a note that γενεα never absolutely means 'nation,' but that it may by the context acquire this sense accidentally from its meaning as race, 'progenies.' This is exactly what is here wanted. Never were a nation so completely one γενεα, in all accuracy of meaning, as the Jewish people.

32.] This is one of those things which the Father hath put in his own power, Acts i. 7, and with which the Son, in his mediatorial office, is not acquainted: see on Mt. We must not deal unfaithfully with a plain and solemn assertion of our Lord (and what can be more so than οὐδὲ ὁ υἱός, in which by the οὐδὲ He is not below but above the angels?) by such evasions as "He does not know it so as to reveal it to us," Wordsw. ("non ita sciebat ut tunc discipulis indicaret." Aug. de Trin. xii. 3.) Of such a sense there is not a hint in the context: nay, it is altogether alien from it. The account given by the orthodox Lutherans, as represented by Meyer, that our Lord knew this κατὰ κτησιν, but not κατὰ χρῆσιν, is right enough if at the same time it is carefully remembered, that it was this κρῆσις of which He emptied Himself when He became man for us, and which it belongs to the very essence of His mediatorial kingdom to hold in subjection to the Father. 33—37.] Peculiar to Mk, and contains the condensed matter of Mt.

vv. 43—47, and perhaps an allusion to the parable of the talents in Mt. xxv. The θυρωρ. is the door-porter, whose office it would be to look out for approaching travellers,—answering especially to the ministers of the word, who are (Ezek. xxxiii.) watchmen to God's church. The construction of ver. 34 is remarkable; the participial clauses being in subordination to ἀφ' οὗ, and constituting part of the householder's arrangements of departure, and the direct tense being assumed at ἔβησε λαρo, as signifying what took place at his very going out of the door, where the porter would be stationed: as if it had been ἀφ' οὗ r. οὗ. αὐτοῦ (καί, &c.) ἔβησε λαρo r. r. λ.

CHAP. XIV. 1, 2.] CONSPIRACY OF THE JEWISH AUTHORITIES AGAINST JESUS. Mt. xxvi. 1—5. Lk. xxii. 1, 2. The account of the events preceding the passion in our Gospel takes a middle rank between those of Mt. and Lk. It contains very few words which are not to be found in one or other of them; but at the same time the variations from both are so frequent and irregular, as in my opinion wholly to preclude the idea that Mk. had ever seen either. The minute analysis of any passage in the three will, I think, convince an unprejudiced examiner of this. On the chronological difficulties which beset this part of the Gospel history, see note on Mt. xxvi. 17. 1. τὸ πᾶσχα καὶ τὰ ἄζ. classed together, because the time of eating the Passover was actually the commencement of the feast of unleavened bread. The announcement by our Lord of his approaching death (Mt. xxvi. 2) is omitted by Mk. and Lk. μήποτε ἔσται indicates a certain expectation of that which is deprecated. See Winer, § 56. 2. b. Notice also ἔσται, not γηνέσεται: “ne, quod suspicamur, tumultus futurus sit,” h. e. “erit alioquin (neque enim oriendi notio inculcatur), ut suspicamur, tumultus.” C. F. Fritzsche, in Fritzscheorum Opuscula, p. 285.

3—9.] THE ANOINTING AT BETHANY. Mt. xxvi. 6—13. Jn. xii. 1—8. (On Lk. vii. 36—50, see note there.) The whole narrative has remarkable points of similarity with that of Jn.,—and is used by Professor Bleek (Beiträge zur Evangelienkritik, p. 83) as one of the indications that Mk. had knowledge of and used the Gospel of Jn. My own view, as explained

ἡ συνγρίψα τὴν ἡ ἀλάβαστρον κατέχεεν αὐτοῦ τῆς κεφαλῆς. ἡσαν δέ τινες ἀγανακτοῦντες πρὸς ἑαυτοὺς· Εἰς τί ἡ ἀπώλεια αὕτη τοῦ μύρου γέγονεν; ἡδύνατο γὰρ τοῦτο τὸ μύρον πραθῆναι ἐπάνω δηναρίων τρια-

in the general Prolegomena, leads me to a different conclusion.

I have already remarked (note on Mt. xxvi. 3), that while Mt. seems to have preserved trace of the parenthetic nature of this narrative, by his τοῦ 81 ἡ. γενομένου (ver. 6), and τότε πορευθεῖς (ver. 14),—such trace altogether fails in our account. It proceeds as if continuous.

8. νάρδου πιστικῆς] It seems impossible to assign any certain, or even probable meaning, to πιστικῆς (a word found here and in Jn.'s narrative only). The Vulg. and the lat. mss. c f₂ q render it "epicatis." The ancient Commentators give us nothing but conjecture. Euthymius and Theophylact interpret it "genuine:" καταπισπιστιμμένην εἰς καθαρότητα, Euth.; ἀδόλον καὶ μὴ δὲ πίστειως κατασκευασθῆσαν, Theophyl.; "veram et absque dolo," Jerome. Augustine supposes it to refer to some place from which the nard came. Origen's comment on the passage is lost. The expression no where occurs in the classics, nor in Clement of Alex., who gives a long account (Pædagog. ii. 8, pp. 76—79 P) of ointments. The word can therefore hardly signify any particular kind of ointment technically so called.

The modern interpretations of the word are principally of two kinds: (1) agreeing with Euth. and Theophyl., "genuine," "unadulterated;" which sense however of the word does not any where else occur. It is used transitively for πιστικός, "persuasive," by Aristotle (Rhet. i. 2), and in some later writers for πιστός, as ὁ πιστικώτατος τῶν θεραπόντων, Cedrenus, Annal., cited by Lücke on Jn. xii. 3. Euseb. also uses the word (Demonstr. Evang. ix. vol. iv. p. 684, ed. Migne), but in the sense of "pertaining to the faith," as his Latin translator renders it, or, as Lücke thinks, perhaps "potable," as a derivative of πιστός (from πίνω). This brings us to the second modern interpretation, which makes πιστικός "liquid," "potable," and derives it as above. There certainly was a kind of ointment which they drank; for Athenæus (xv. 39, p. 689) quotes from Hicæsius, τῶν μύρων ἃ μὲν ἱστί χρίματα, ἃ δ' ἀλείμματα. καὶ ῥόδινον μὲν πρὸς πότον ἐπιτηδεύον, ἐπὶ δὲ μύρσινον, μήλιγον τοῦτο δὲ ἱστί καὶ εὐστόμαχον καὶ ληθαργικοῖς χρήσιμον . . . καὶ ἡ στακὴ δ' ἐπιτηδεύει πρὸς πότον, ἐπὶ δὲ νάρδος. The only objection to this interpretation is, that the word is no where found—which however is not so decisive as in the last case, for as πιστικός from πιστός, "faithful," so there might be πιστικός from πιστός, "potable,"—and from being a term confined to dealers in ointments, it might have escaped notice elsewhere.

Lücke (from whom the substance of this note is derived) seems to incline to Augustine's conjecture (see above): but then surely the name would be more common, as "balm of Gilead," &c.

The uncertainty being so great, the best rendering would be to leave the word untranslated, as Jer. Taylor does in his "Life of Christ" (sect. 15): "Nard Pistick." Dr. Wordsw. sees in the word the mystical sense, that "offerings to Christ should be . . . the fruits of a lively and loving πίστις, or faith, in Him." συντρ. τὴν ἀλάβ.] can hardly mean only having broken the resin with which the cork was sealed. In ch. v. 4: John xix. 36: Rev. ii. 27, the word is used of breaking, properly so called: and I see no objection to supposing that the ἀλάβαστρον was crushed in the hand, and the ointment thus poured over His head. The feet would then (John xii. 3) be anointed with what remained on the hands of Mary, or in the broken vase (see note on Luke vii. 38). 4, 5. τινες] See notes
